Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, if the Senator would yield for further inquiry, we are getting into knee-deep difficulties here. There is good faith on both sides. I do not attribute anything, but one particular Senator for instance on February 23 stated in the New York Times—this happened to have been a Republican Senator, but I am sure we have had and may have similar situations. He went on to quote. It gives a whole quotation about a witness T13. The report goes on to say that he saw—I am not going to repeat him because I do not think there is any need. But it goes on and on about a detailed situation wherein the Senator in that instance clearly revealed FBI information.

Does that mean that whole subject is opening up now? If so, what we are going to do is go outside, tell the news media, let it be printed, then come in here and talk about it. That is the worst way possible to handle this situation. I do not think we ought to do that.

I do not know what the ruling of the Chair would be. I would submit to Senators that we ought to restrict the FBI report in terms of the way we discuss it to our own opinions and conclusions drawing therefrom because, if we do not, there is going to be no end to it.

Whatever the Chair may rule, I think that we have an obligation, and although there already have been a number of leaks—I do not doubt there are going to be leaks—if we open it up and discuss everything in detail that has appeared in the news media, we are not going to have a confidentiality of that report.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator?

Mr. GLENN. Without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I would simply like to join my colleague from Georgia in saying this would be a total circumvention of the process adopted in the Rules of the Senate to protect this type of material. There is work under way to determine once again whether or not there is any possibility to permit some use of the material in S-407. It may well be a continuing process throughout this debate. But the chairman and I did our best together with the White House counsel, without success, and I think for the time being I would hope Senators would honor the material that is up there, and not in any way indulge in trying to circumvent the rule. I would suggest that the distinguished Senator from Ohio, once again, repeat his offer, to start from the beginning and expunge the material that he has stated.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield for a question?

Mr. GLENN. Without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. WILSON. I thank the Senator.

I would like to ask my colleague from Virginia or my colleague from Georgia, since they have expressed a similar view, how they feel that justice can be done to the nominee when in fact both those who favor and those who oppose his confirmation are limited to expressions of opinion—and when in fact the nominee has already been trashed nationally and internationally by the kind of anonymous leaking that has been given broad network news coverage for weeks and weeks.

I have used a harsh phrase in saying that I think that the confirmation process has been contaminated, has been hijacked, has in fact been corrupted, not because there is any lack of diligence on the part of the committee or the committee staff, but because someone has leaked damaging allegations which are unsubstantiated, there has been no leakage or characterization of the rebuttal evidence until the recent White House effort to characterize the evidence.

I would ask my friend from Virginia or my friend from Georgia, how in the world can justice be done? It seems to me that in fact the evidence that we have all seen now—at least I think most Senators have been up to S-407 and seen the evidence—if it were released, does not jeopardize any national security interest. But the confinement of that evidence to the secure room except that when it is leaked to the national network evening news does present a situation that cannot help but continue to be grossly unfair to the nominee.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, in response——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio still has the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. GLENN. I yield. I reserve my right to the floor. I yield for other purposes without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, in response to the inquiry of the Senator from California, the leadership at this very moment together with the managers of this nomination are trying to perform some further work on this issue. The Senator raises very valid questions, questions that have troubled the chairman, I, and others for some period of time. But at this particular moment I would suggest to the Senator from California and others that we abide by the present, shall we call, ground rules that we will not make reference in any way to the material in S-407 until such time as the leadership and others might address this question.

Mr. NUNN. Will the Senator yield for just a moment? I will respond to that. I do not suggest it. I hope we can avoid it. But it may be necessary to have a closed session. Senators are the ones who are going to have to vote on this. If the President wants to release the FBI report after considering the ramifications and the precedent and all of that, he can release the whole thing, and there will not be a problem. I do not know that that would be a wise course. I do not advocate that. But he can do it.

On the other hand, if he does it, we can have a closed session of the Senate and have all this information down here on the desk, have a debate, and the people who are going to have to vote on it will be able to do it.

I know the public will not be involved in that. That is not good. I would like to have a full debate, too. But we also have to consider this President, and other Presidents, and whether they are going to be able to have an FBI report that has any confidentiality. That gets right down to the heart of whether the people are going to be willing to talk to the President's representatives about prospective people in high levels of Government. It is not a simple issue.

Mr. WILSON. If I may respond——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERRY). The Senator from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. GLENN. I yield without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. WILSON. I thank the Senator from Ohio.

I think the point is simply this. If we have a closed session, yes, we can discuss it among ourselves, but there has already been too much public debate among Senators as to perception—and the statement that whether or not—to quote my good friend from Ohio—the perception is unfair or fair, it is nonetheless the public perception. The question has been raised as to whether because of these perceptions or appearances Senator Tower can give the leadership necessary to bring about reforms within the Department of Defense.

In the effort to resolve this question, I say to my friend from Georgia and to my friend from Virginia that I think we have to give great consideration to the fact that already there has been aired publicly a partial presentation of this evidence, that a closed session of the Senate would not repair the damage that has been done, and that fairness really requires that we deal not just among ourselves, but that we have a significantly public process to fully air the rebuttal as well as the allegations.

Otherwise, I think, Mr. President, we are in grave danger of leaving what has become a contaminated process hopelessly contaminated. It is no wonder that the public, according to a Time magazine poll, has an unfavorable opinion of Senator Tower. I do not know how they could avoid having one. The only things they have heard on the evening news for weeks have been these allegations. So I understand why it is that the chairman is seeking to observe what have been traditional processes. The fact is that those traditional processes have not been observed in the process of this confirmation. Someone he does not know, and I do not either, has been busily leaking confidential information. I would say that the damage has already been done.

The Senate must recognize that, and understand that we cannot have a fair confirmation process by leaving things in the current status.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLENN. I yield, without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. NUNN. While we are discussing the release of the FBI report, I think we ought to also understand that if that is done, we have a whole lot of material in the executive session in the Armed Services Committee, a whole lot of private documents, a whole lot of things that relate to testimony, witnesses, and so forth. So any effort to release the FBI report, it seems to me, if we are going to have it all where people can make a judgment, and this is just as much a part of the record as the other, would include the executive session testimony that we have had, and we would include all the documents that we have and the allegations we have.

If you want it all out there, we can do that. I would say that we have all sorts of business about Geneva. We have a huge amount of information in there that relates to allegations about Geneva. So somebody will have to think carefully about this, all of us, now, about how much you want out there. How much do you believe is necessary for fairness?

I want to be fair. I want everybody in here to understand as much of the facts as possible. But if we set this precedent right here, I would ask the Parliamentarian and the Presiding Officer to think very carefully about that precedent. I hope it is not a precedent. I hope, with Senator BYRD on the floor, that we can understand the ramifications of what has just been done. Maybe it is not new, but it has to be handled carefully.

If, on another matter, we have, let us say, a foreign intelligence matter that comes out in the New York Times, a Senator can then get up on the floor, because we have had one leak of some very sensitive information relating to national security—nothing to do with a nominee, and that precedent holds—a Senator can get up on the floor and make reference to that national security information with total sanctity under the Senate rules.

Mr. WILSON. No one is suggesting that.

Mr. NUNN. We are talking about a precedent that I hope is not going to be a precedent here, because the Parliamentarian just ruled on the question of whether something which has been in the public print can be referred to freely on the floor of the Senate. We had better think that over very carefully.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLENN. I yield, without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the Chair did not rule. I think all Senators should understand that the Chair only rules in response to a point of order. There was no point of order made.

The Senator from Arizona propounded a parliamentary inquiry. No Chair has ever issued a ruling in response to a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair may respond that, in his opinion, thus and so. That is not a ruling. I call this to the attention of Senators so that it might help them in the future:

On page XI, the very first page in the preface of the book on Senate procedure, the last paragraph:

> It will be observed that the footnotes divide themselves into two classes: those without, and those with the word "See" and "See also." Those without are rulings by the Presiding Officer or decisions by the Senate, and those with "See" are responses by the Chair to parliamentary inquiries in cases where the opinions expressed are in keeping with the practices of the Senate, even though in such cases an appeal from an opinion expressed by the Presiding Officer in reply to a parliamentary inquiry is not in order.

That is very important. If it is a ruling by the Chair on a point of order, such ruling can be appealed by a Senator. But if it is a response to a parliamentary inquiry, there can be no appeal of that expression of opinion by the Chair. So that is a very, very weak precedent, if any, I assure the Senator from Georgia.

So that the RECORD might show a response of the Chair to this question and so that it will not stand just as a statement by the Senator from West Virginia, may I inquire of the Chair if I am correct in the statement that I have made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, the Senator was correct. The ruling only occurs in response to a point of order.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Chair, and I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. NUNN. I am relieved to hear the Senator from West Virginia give that explanation, as usually he is the expert on the rules.

I hope we would take this under advisement with the leadership, consulting with the Chair and the Parliamentarian, before we make this a precedent. It has very serious implications. It would give the Senate the right to basically confirm certain extremely detrimental material being in the news media, that it is one thing when it appears and another thing when it is confirmed by people in the Government.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. GLENN. I yield, without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I would agree that had that been a ruling rather than simply the response or opinion of the Chair to the inquiry, it would be an overly broad rule.

I think the situation that is before us is easily distinguishable. The chairman is correct in expressing his concern that we not compromise national security interests, where those are, in fact, jeopardized by that kind of leakage. That is not the case in this instance. What has been jeopardized, instead, is Senator Tower's reputation.

So I think that at such time as a point of order is raised or at such point as we have undertaken to resolve this dilemma, we have to include in the resolution a concern about this specific instance, which is one that is distinguishable from one where the national security would be jeopardized.

Beyond that, I just say I think we need to be concerned, as well, about basic fairness. The chairman, earlier today, commented on what has been reported in the Washington Post in a story by a reputable—in fact, a highly reputed—investigative reporter, and he identifies only "sources." The chairman does not know how the reporter came by this information, nor do I.

The chairman has expressed his feeling that it is unfair to the nominee, and indeed it is. I will simply say this is only the most recent example of this kind of thing. Far more people have heard on the evening news, and I am told will hear tonight, from this very witness, than will read the Washington Post story.

There is something even more important than the reputation of John Tower at stake here, even more important than the question of whether for the first time in history we deny a new President his nominee for a Cabinet position.

What is at stake is the very distinct possibility of creating an evil precedent, whereby through manipulation, anonymously, of the national news media, we so permeate and so contaminate the confirmation process that it ceases to be what the framers intended.

I suggest to Senators that we are in danger of setting such a precedent, and if that occurs, it has an importance that overrides even the reputation of John Tower, because in being unfair to him, we will be guilty of permitting the deception of the American people. I suggest that that is not something we can simply suffer. We will have to resolve this.

The first amendment is the most important of all our freedoms, and probably all the others flow from it and depend on it, but it is being abused. There has to be a means of resolving this question, not just in fairness to John Tower or to George Bush, but to the confirmation process and the duty that we, as Senators, owe the American people, under the Constitution.

I thank my friend from Ohio for his generosity.

Thank you, Mr. President,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I would suggest that expunging which I agreed to a little while ago, when I had made my opening remarks for the first 6 or 7 minutes and I came down to a portion where I quoted from the summary memorandum that President Bush had read before he made his nomination on December 16 and it was titled "Summary Memorandum Containing the Partial Results of the Investigation of John G. Tower"—I suggest that as a way out of this, that all after that in my remarks be expunged, and I will pick it up at that point without repeating the earlier remarks.

I ask unanimous consent that be permitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. GLENN. I yield for a question, yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is the Senator able to estimate the length of time it will take him to complete his remarks uninterrupted?

Mr. GLENN. Half hour.

Mr. MITCHELL. Half hour.

Mr. GLENN. Thereabouts.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then, Mr. President, it is now my intention to propound a unanimous-consent request. I know the distinguished Republican leader is here. I have discussed this with him and with both the majority and minority managers.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for 1 minute?

Mr. GLENN. I yield without losing my right to the floor.

Mr. McCAIN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I have some information I think would be very interesting to the Members of this body and others concerning the allegation that was printed on the front page of the Washington Post this morning concerning an allegation made by a retired Technical Sergeant Jackson concerning some alleged behavior on the part of Senator John Tower during some period between 1976 and 1978.

I remind my colleagues it was on the front page of the Washington Post. We have now received information that this individual's last duty was when he reported to Berkstrom Air Force Base on February 21, 1976. His last duty day was March 16, 1977. He was referred to the Wilford Hall Medical Center for Psychological Evaluation and was later retired for psychiatric disability, and the details of that can be made available. He was permanently retired on April 19, 1978 for a psychiartic condition.

I also point out that the 12th Air Force commander from June 1975 through June 1978 recalls John Tower to be in Berkstrom only once during the period, the first Saturday of August 1975 for an air show. That memory has been confirmed by the wing commander and vice wing commander and master chief of the Air Force.

Mr. President, the reason I am bringing this very important information to the attention of this body is that this allegation was obviously given great credibility by the media by being printed on the front page of the Washington Post. I think it clearly indicates there is no validity to that and very little we can do to repair the damage that is done by this allegation and I understand was going to be carried on national media tonight.

I hope it clears up the situation, and we will be glad to provide further details on this information we received.

I thank my friend from Ohio for yielding.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLENN. Without losing my right to the floor.

UNANIMOUS CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that today, Thursday, March 2, at 5:45 p.m., the Senate temporarily lay aside the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense and proceed to the nomination of Edward J. Derwinski to be Secretary of Veterans' Affairs under a time agreement, 1 hour, equally divided between the Senator from California, Mr. CRANSTON, and the Senator from Arkansas, Mr. MURKOWSKI, or their designees, provided that no motions be in order and that following the using or yielding back of time the Senate proceed without any intervening business to a 15-minute vote on the nomination.

Mr. GLENN. Will the majority leader make that 6 o'clock? I may not be quite done.

Mr. MITCHELL. Provided further that upon the disposition of the nomination the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table, the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of the nomination and the Senate return to the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has asked that I change the time here to 6 p.m. and I accordingly do so so that the unanimous consent would be that at 6 p.m. the Senate temporarily lay aside the Tower nomination and move to the nomination of Derwinski with all other aspects of the unanimous consent request to be as stated by me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I shall not, I was not here. Did the majority leader request a vote at a time certain on the Derwinski nomination?

Mr. MITCHELL. No. The vote will be in accordance with the request following the using or yielding back of time. Therefore, the vote will occur at 7 p.m. if all time is used or sooner if time is yielded back.

Mr. PRYOR. I thank the majority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request? Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR YEAS AND NAYS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I further ask unanimous consent that it be in order to now request the yeas and nays on the Derwinski nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I now ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Ohio and the distinguished Republican leader.

NOMINATION OF JOHN G. TOWER TO BE SECRETARY OF DEFENSE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GLENN. Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. President, as I was saying——

Mr. BYRD. About an hour ago.

Mr. GLENN. When President Bush made his nomination on December 16 he had read a partial FBI report. The President read a report titled as follows: "Summary Memorandum Containing the Partial Results of the Investigation of John G. Tower."

He went ahead and made the nomination even though there had been a month of debate back and forth between the White House and the staff as to whether this nomination should be made. So they had their own doubts going in.

The nominee at that time, Senator Tower, had said that he had no alcohol abuse problem, period. That is what the President had to go on.

Now, there are examples all through the 1970's and 1980's, most of which have been in the press. I will not characterize them again except to say they are overwhelming in evidence as far as I am concerned with all of the slang remarks, all of the types of references that describe drunkeness that we are all very familiar with, and these are repeated over and over and over again.

After that started occurring at that time, the nominee instead of saying that he had no alcohol abuse earlier, then started talking about yes, he drank some in his younger days. That is public. That was not out of the FBI report.

There are a number of references to the problems back in the 1970's and at that point the White House then said yes, there had been an abuse problem back in earlier days.

Now, the nominee then said he had a problem back in earlier days and talked publicly about drinking too much.

He then stated on the Brinkley program last Sunday—the program I was on at a different time period—that 12 years ago he gave up Scotch, but said he still drinks wine—stuck with wine since that time and with an occasional martini and vodka sometimes with salmon and caviar.

Now through all of these references, both before the committee and publicly, the nominee has talked about drinking wine now as though that is diet-rite soda pop; as though there is no problem, and it can be proven because he only drinks wine. Well, I would submit that does not prove very much to me. Because, if you look at the problem, it is alcohol; it is not whether it comes in wine or whether it comes in bourbon or whether it comes in scotch. The problem is alcohol.

The facts are that a 1½ ounce standard shot of 80 proof whisky is equaled in alcoholic content by a 12-ounce beer, 4½ percent beer, and it is equaled by the usual 4½ ounce glass of wine at 12 percent. And so what we are talking about is alcohol consumption. We are not talking about what the form is that it comes in unless we know how much wine is actually consumed.

But the record is replete. I see how no one being fair in reading that FBI report can come away with any conclusion but that there was an alcohol abuse problem in the seventies and that the problem extends up into the 1980's, and no reason to believe that it is not current at the present time.

We have been castigated on our side for fairness and for truth. It has been said that we are not being fair with this because we cannot release this information. Well, if that is important to this nomination, the President is the possessor of the FBI report. He is in control of it. And I do not believe in just letting that go down. I still hope we can work something out with regard to that FBI report.

The truth is relevant, in spite of what was quoted a while ago as being in the press; which, incidentally, quoted me by name because I had said that the opinions and perceptions of the military, and how they control nuclear weapons and how sobriety is demanded, and how it is checked before people are let into that program. I said that was something I thought was relevant. I thought that perceptions there, which our military is judged on, were important. So when that was taken out of context, I thought that that was unfair to me.

So I would correct that here today, that the truth is indeed relevant. And if we are to have fairness and truth, then I think we have to implore the President to do something about getting that FBI report out so that everyone can have the advantage of the same information the rest of us have read.

I do not vote on blind allegiance to the President, Democrat or Republican, either one. And, yet, people on the other side of the aisle are being implored to be loyal to the President. In other words, ignore what you have read, ignore what impressions you get out of that FBI report and have blind allegiance to the President. This is a new President, they say; never in history have we had a new President who had a Cabinet position turned down. Mr. President, the advise-and-consent role of the Senate does not say, "except for new Presidents." The advise-and-consent role still applies, and we are to put our best judgment to it.

Senators must judge. They must read that report. After reading the report I cannot come to any conclusion, but that there was a big problem and a very good chance there will still be a problem.

And this allegation of partisanship I do not accept at all. I have voted with the Republicans on the other side in committee over there on at least one important matter where I was the only Democrat that voted with them and received a lot of criticism on my side of the aisle for siding with them. It was a decisive vote. I was the swing vote.

So I let my views of where we stand with regard to our country be the measure by which I judge things. During the Carter years, I opposed a Democratic President on occasion. I was judged harshly for that in the Democratic ranks, but that is the way it is.

I would say this, that as far as our politics are concerned, if there has been any politics it has been on the other side of the aisle. Because I can tell you this: that Senator MITCHELL, as our majority leader, has consistently said that he wanted everyone to read the report and make their own individual judgments.

What has been the record so far on this charge of partisanship? Let me talk about that just a second. Do you know we have approved on this floor so far 13 nominations of the President of the United States, And in all those 13 nominations that have now been approved and gone back to the President approved, there has been only one on which there was one vote against the President's nomination and that came from a Republican Senator. One vote out of all those 13 nominations, 100 Senators voting. That is 1,300 votes. So this charge of partisanship is a bunch of nonsense as far as I am concerned. It just is not true. The record is not there.

The President came in and wanted us to hold early hearings to get his people approved. We did that. I held hearings before Inauguration Day to help him get Richard Darman approved for OMB. I commented to President Bush at the White House one night, when we were over there for a chairmen's reception, that I thought he had an opportunity to be a great President because he comes with a background unparalleled in the history of our country, and that he had made all the right moves. I want to cooperate with him. I have no animus at all toward President Bush, none whatsoever.

But I can guarantee you that in our role of advise and consent in the Senate, I do not see how anyone can read that report, those FBI reports, of what happened in the seventies, what is still occurring in the 1980's, without coming to exactly the same conclusion, unless they are being overwhelmed with this loyalty to the President that is being called for.

Perhaps it would be advisable later on, after this debate has ceased and we have gone on to other things here, for someone to consider, if they do not like this way of doing things, that we change that, that we put in a constitutional amendment and change the advise and consent role of the Senate that the Founding Fathers put in, and that the second opinion of the President that we provide here in the Senate to nominations, that we change that and truly give a President his right to appoint anyone he likes. Maybe that should be proposed, but I do not agree with that.

There are a couple of other things I want to say, related to this nomination process. One is, I have been absolutely amazed to read some of the press reports about how we are somehow trying to create a great move of power to Capitol Hill and we want to influence all foreign policy and we are out to wound the new President. I do not know where that stuff is coming from, but it certainly is not coming from any discussions that I have been in on here on anything to do with the Tower nomination. I guess the press thrives on confrontation. I understand that. But that just takes it so far that it is ludicrous, as far as I am concerned.

This is no power play with the administration; never has been. We do not plan to make it that. It is not a plan to wound the President. I wish the President well. I want to work with him.

I just think, in this particular case, when you look at the whole record, which I submit I am not even sure the President has seen to this day—what he saw was the first summary before he made the nomination, and that was not even a complete FBI report.

Someone had a news report one night that what we are doing is hurting foreign policy. They asked one of the reporters at the other end of the line in China with the President about what impact the Tower nomination was having on the President's talk with Chinese leaders. The response was, well, it had not even come up as far as they knew; that they were not paying any attention to it; that it was a domestic issue. And of course it is.

Now, let me return to the alcohol problem. I want to address this specifically from the standpoint of the Defense Department, separate from Lincoln or Grant or Churchill which have been brought up repeatedly throughout this debate; about how great they were in spite of their overindulgence in alcohol. I don't know whether this is supposed to mean that our people in the military should become alcohol abusers and they will be like Grant and Churchill. But that has been brought up repeatedly to somehow excuse alcohol abuse. I do not look at it that way at all. They functioned not because of alcohol but in spite of it.

But how does the military approach the problem of alcohol abuse? Well, let us look at that. The military looks at this matter of alcohol as being so important that not only are alcohol abuse programs in effect for the whole Department of Defense but, in particular, there is a Department of Defense directive, the subject of which is "Nuclear Weapon Personnel Reliability Program."

It describes why they think this program is necessary and they have the types of people listed who have to go through special screening. It is not just people in command or supervisory positions. For example it is people who handle missiles, and those who handle nuclear weapons in almost any way that are subject to the Personnel Reliability Program and Screening before they can get into any program related to nuclear weapons.

Many people aspire to get into that program. They want to spend their careers in that program and the qualifications are there. But there are also disqualifying factors. If they have one of those disqualifying traits in their background, they cannot get into the program. If they exhibit any one of those traits once they are in a nuclear weapons assignment—officer or enlisted—they have to get out of the program. They are kicked out. Let me read from the directive:

Disqualifying, "Any of the following traits or conduct shall normally be considered disqualifying."

The first trait listed, is "alcohol abuse."

If you have that in your background, you do not get in. If you exhibit it while you are in the program, you get kicked out. They pay strict attention to that. This is the DOD directive, right here. That is the way it reads. That is the specific language in from the directive.

Why do they view it that way? Well, say they want to be safe with nuclear weapons—they do. But there are two things, it seems to me, that makes the Department of Defense and the military different from any other department. It is not like working at the Department of Agriculture, Department of Commerce, or Interior or something like that. When you are in a nuclear weapons program, you have two things you may face and you may face them very, very rapidly.

No. 1, your actions may have to be timely. You are not always given overnight to decide what action to take. If you are a nuclear weapons specialist, or a commanding officer, or a communications expert, or a truck driver transporting a missile, you may not have 12 or 14 hours or 2 days from now to prepare for your mission. They may say: We are going in minutes. We have to do this. There is a national emergency. So the time factor in those jobs can be quite different. So that is one difference: Timeliness of action is one reason the military has to have a personnel reliability directive. Reason No. 2: The consequences of a mistake may alter the whole course of history. It is that important. Your actions may be required in a very short period of time. Your judgment cannot be impaired. And the consequences of a mistake may be cataclysmic. You may blow up some of our own people if you make a mistake. We may not get the weapons off on time. There are many things that may happen.

For the sons and daughters serving around this world who serve in that Nuclear Weapons Program and have gone through that kind of screening to get there, and they are on that career track, can we permit a lesser standard for a Secretary of Defense than we require for those people in uniform who are on nuclear weapons assignments? I say no.

There is another reason a Secretary of Defense has to be that reliable also. He is part of the National Command Authorities. I use the plural. That is usually stated the other way, "National Command Authority," and we mean the President. The way it is actually written is, "The National Command Authorities." In the plural.

It originated in DOD Directive 1500.30, paragraph 3(a), dated December 2, 1971. It has been in effect since then, no changes have been made.

First, regarding the NCA, the U.S. Constitution designates the President as the Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces. Second, the National Security Act of 1947 designates the Secretary of Defense as the President's executive agent, he is to carry out the President's orders.

Third, no statute defines the term "National Command Authorities," but it is in the plural and the interpretation of that, which is in the book "U.S./Soviet Military Balance Concepts and Capabilities, 1960 to 1980," contains the following definition:

> National Command Authorities: The top national decisionmakers of a country. In the United States they are limited to the President, the Secretary of Defense, and their duly deputized alternates or successors.

The President is the supreme authority regarding the use of nuclear weapons. But the Secretary of Defense is right in there with him. We have had rumors in the past that certain Secretaries of Defense, when they wanted to tell the President something about a situation going on in the world, were advised that the President has been at this party or that party, and questions have been raised and there is some question as to whether things should come up at that time. If there was an incapacitated President, who serves? It is the Secretary of Defense.

So, what I said about the military with regard to timeliness of action—you cannot wait. You may not have a day to decide what action to take. You may not have an hour. And the consequences of a mistake, a mistake of judgment—well, you cannot imagine the consequences. We could change the course of history, as I said.

Returning to the Personnel Reliability Program, how does the military make their judgments on the people that go into that program? How strict are they? Are they brought in, given rights of appeal? Can the person say: well, I used to abuse alcohol but I don't any more? No, that will probably keep him out, unless it was a long time ago and the person has gone through some kind of rehabilitation.

Are there rules of evidence? Are there examinations and cross examinations permitted when a board is formed to select people for the nuclear weapons assignment? No. There is no appeal. It is an opinion that somebody has formed. It is a perception that that person is either reliable or not; that he either has a problem or not. I wish all the rules of evidence were there to protect members of the military that requests a nuclear assignment or is in a nuclear assignment and about to get kicked out. I wish it was possible to give them protection of the court, evidence, examination, cross examination, but that is not the way the military works. We do not have that kind of protection. It would be too cumbersome.

Regarding the position of Secretary of Defense, I do not see how you can judge a Secretary of Defense any differently than people in the military judge themselves because leadership in this area has to be by example. The military above all other organizations I know of leads by example. And that should be from the Secretary of Defense on down. The Secretary of Defense is the leader of our military and that leadership, to me, has to be by example.

Another area I want to address is perception. How do the people across this country perceive us? What is their expectation of the performance of public officials in Washington? Well, that is, indeed, a different subject. I think there is a lot left to be desired here.

Perceptions in the mind of the public as to the expectations of their public officials in Washington and perceptions in the minds of the military personnel about leadership that we select for them and leadership that they look to, to lead by example.

Concerning Senator Tower, those perceptions are formed, however, by the nominee's own actions. These perceptions are based on the committee reports, this debate, press and media interpretations and by original investigative reporting, of which there has been much in this particular case. And perhaps that is considered not fair. But it is the system, and we as Senators have to make our judgment based on this information.

It has been brought up by a number of people that we cannot judge impartially because, after all, we have problems right here in the Senate with some of our own people sometimes.

Agreed. I agree with that 100 percent. I can talk about some Senators who are no longer around here who had some problems I was aware of. I would say if Senators right here had to go through this same confirmation process, it might weed out a few around here. Not many. Not many. I don't know many around here that I think abuse alcohol. But I think occasionally there are some. So, are we judged by a different standard? Well, perhaps we are. I do not deny that.

But we go through a different confirmation process, too. We go through a confirmation process called election. We do not come before our colleagues here. We go back home. If there is a problem with alcohol abuse, we depend upon the people to single out those people who cannot pass muster in that regard, if they think it is interfering with performance here on the floor. And that is the way it should be.

I do not question there is a double standard here. We just go through a different confirmation process. That is the main point I wanted to make.

It is too bad that is the case, I guess. But I would say, too, in defense of the military, here on the Senate floor we are 1 of 100 votes. The other day, I saw Senator Tower on TV when he was saying he has seen people come on the Senate floor not sober and vote on nuclear matters. Well, that is right, but they are not in the chain of command and did not have the right to order nuclear weapons around and change the status or disposition of our troops, wherever they are in this world.

So do we have a problem here sometimes? Yes, but we are 1 of 100, and we do not have the military timeliness factor I mentioned, and the possible consequences of action that can result from that timeliness requirement in an emergency.

Do we have military emergencies? Yes, we have had 8 or 10 over the last 10 or 12 years where it was a real emergency. The President had to be notified in the middle of the night, had to make decisions; the Secretary of Defense right along with him every time.

So the same timeliness requirements apply and the same potential for consequences of a mistake are right there.

The DOD policy is not to assign someone to a key position or even lesser positions in that nuclear chain of command. Alcohol abuse disqualifies a person, and we can have no lesser standard, as I see it.

There is one other area. Military is very strict on their policies with what they call fraternization. In days past, that was called womanizing. That is a difficult subject to discuss. How do you define it? I always thought if there was a womanizing problem, there was a woman having a manhandling problem. Maybe there is a way to turn this thing so we equal it out. That has been brought up. It has received much press attention.

Is it right? I do not know. How do you define it? That is less definable than the alcohol, as far as I am concerned, but the perception is out there.

In the military, there are strict rules of fraternization and how you treat women in the military? It is with respect and dignity. You do not go on a military base today but where you see women as an integral part of the command, working there with the same effectiveness as the men.

When those lines of impropriety are crossed with regard to fraternization, they are dealt with harshly. We have had, over the last several years, over 20 military male officers court-martialed out, and probably several times that number who chose to resign to avoid court-martial. It is an issue that receives very special consideration in the military now.

Mr. COHEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLENN. That perception is there. The perception is in the press. I cannot verify them but it is a perception that is out.

Mr. COHEN. Is the Senator suggesting there is evidence that Senator Tower manhandled a woman in the military?

Mr. GLENN. No, I did not say that. I did not say that at all.

Mr. COHEN. That is what you are implying.

Mr. GLENN. I did not use Senator Tower's name. What I said with regard to manhandling was that I do not like the term "womanizing." That is the point I was making. I think you came in after I was stating that. I never liked that term. It always takes two people, whatever that is. I do not know what the counterterm would be. I was talking about manhandling. I was not referring to Senator Tower at all. I think the RECORD will show that.

Mr. COHEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GLENN. The military has very strict policies. Over 20 male officers have been drummed out of the service, and women will not be subjected to degrading treatment.

Where does this leave us? At each step along this confirmation process FBI reports have been received by the committee. In addition, allegations have been reported in the press and by investigative reporting. I do not know whether this process is right or wrong, but I know that we each have to make up our own minds after reading those FBI reports. After having started out being in favor of voting for the nominee, at each step along the way, I have had more doubt cast on the ability of the nominee to truly set the example. Our military officers and enlisted personnel expect and deserve reliable leadership. National security demands it. We do not permit people in military command assignments if there is any doubt. Military people are not let into certain positions if there is any doubt. I just feel that we cannot hold our Secretary of Defense to lesser standards than we demand of our people in the military.

Mr. President, the Army Times, Navy Times, Air Force Times, and Defense News, are usually referred to as the military press although I will not say they always express the views of the top military and people in the Department of Defense. They are run by civilians, but they comment on and follow closely matters in the military. I think their views should be taken into consideration here.

I submit to be printed at the end of my remarks the editorials out of those publications. One is from the Army Times and says, "Tower Should Go." Another is from the Navy Times which says, "The Tower Vote," and recommends against him. One is from Defense News and is entitled "Tower Should Step Aside." Another one is from the Air Force Times and says, "Not Tower."

I do think their views are important and should be made part of the record. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that those editorials be printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[See exhibit 1.]

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I can assure everyone here that I do not enjoy voting against John Tower. I wish I could in good conscience vote for him, but I have bigger concerns. There are greater loyalties. I have to do my best to provide, in my own little way in the Senate, the military with unquestioned leadership in the areas that have been widely discussed during the last few weeks; leadership that will, without doubt and without any concern, be leadership by example. That is the reason why I cast my vote as I did in the Armed Services Committee, and will cast my vote against this nomination on the floor.

[From the Army Times, Feb. 13, 1989]

TOWER SHOULD GO

John Tower should withdraw his nomination to be the next secretary of defense.

Out of concern for the military, which the former Texas senator clearly loves, he should step aside. Tower's public position has been so compromised by the agonizing process by which he was nominated and is being confirmed—as of this writing the Senate Armed Services Committee has postponed its vote on the matter—that he cannot be the strong spokesman the Defense Department needs now.

We are reluctant to pass judgment on Tower's character per se. It takes a judge with more moral clarity than we would claim to reach a definitive verdict on the charges of womanizing and high living that have surfaced along Tower's troubled road to the Pentagon post. Edward Kennedy has survived much more serious charges to serve a long term in the Senate. Are the standards for a defense secretary so much higher than for a senator?

More troubling and more at issue is Tower's position as a consultant to defense contractors. No one has claimed Tower acted illegally in receiving big fees from defense firms in return for what, by Tower's own description, was precious little real information. But the speed and greed with which Tower spun through the revolving door is apalling.

Though the charges against Tower may be unproven, they undeniably create the impression of a man much too cozy with the Pentagon's worst ways of doing business. Indeed, he is almost a caricature of how most people see the Defense Department, a kind of Mr. Military-Industrial Complex.

Balancing this is the "Nixon-goes-to-China" argument. That is, Tower will be able to tame the Pentagon's wasteful ways and make reforms stick because he is such a long-term supporter of the military. In his confirmation hearings Tower said, "I understand we must live within constraints. I am not such a mindless hawk that I would come to you and ask you for a substantial increase in defense expenditure when I know it is not going to happen."

Tower recognized that he would be viewed with suspicion in asking for defense increases. But how then can he credibly support the current defense budget, which calls for a 2 percent real increase in spending? And how can he make the argument—which needs desperately to be made by someone—the national security may be more important than this year's Gramm-Rudman number? The United States is about to enter into two most important arms negotiations in history and needs to stick to its guns to reach a successful conclusion.

And to maintain a national consensus on military spending, the Pentagon badly needs to have its image resurrected from the Golgotha where spare parts scandals and Operation Ill Wind and pique at our allies and many other problems have marooned it. Is John Tower the man to do that?

Alas, no.

It seems cruel to deprive a man with the skills to do a job he desperately wants to do of the opportunity to make good. And we may be making a moot point, as the Senate seems intent on confirming Tower come hell or high water.

But George Bush, who says he cares deeply about ethics in government, might want to reconsider. The president's sense of loyalty may be too strong.

Or Tower may summon personal courage of his own—it would take uncommon courage to refuse now the job he wants so much—to step aside. It might be the best help he can give to his friends in the military.

[From the Navy Times, Mar. 6, 1989]

THE TOWER VOTE

President Bush gambled and apparently lost on the nomination of former Sen. John Tower to be Secretary of Defense. The Senate Armed Services Committee sent the nomination to the Senate floor with a recommendation not to confirm.

The vote split along party lines—11 Democrats against Tower, nine Republicans voting in favor of their former colleague. If the partisan pattern holds, the nomination will be defeated in the Senate where Democrats hold a 55-45 majority.

Critics of committee chairman Sam Nunn, D-Ga, say with some bitterness that he allowed rumor and innuendo about Tower's social life to rule the day. They suggest that Nunn had his way with Defenses when Frank C. Carlucci was secretary, and now he bristles at the thought of no formidable an adversary as Tower taking over that post.

Those charges themselves seem the fruit of politics and bruised egos, As Navy Times went to press, no version of the FBI investigation into Tower's personal habits had been released. The public has no way to access the material that swayed Democratic conservatives like Nunn and Sen. John Glenn, D-Ohio, to vote against the nomination. But Sen. John Warner's observation that reasonable men can disagree on the implications of the FBI reports in no ringing denunciation of Nunn's leadership on this issue.

Both Nunn and Tower care deeply about national security and those serving in the armed forces. Tower served with distinction in the Senate for 24 years, He's been a strong supporter of the Sea Services. As a master chief in the Naval Reserve, he holds a special affection for the Navy.

But the Senate has an obligation to vote down a nomination when sufficient questions of character are raised. All those investigations were opportunities to alley the Democrats' concerns. They did not.

The vote in committee came down to two issues. The first is whether Tower is a good choice to handle the tough decisions ahead for defense. He has the brains and background to handle the job.

The second, however, involves leadership, and that includes personal habits. "Will we demand less of our Secretary of Defense than we do of our people in uniform?," Glenn asked.

We shouldn't. And military people need to know we won't. The Defense Secretary should be, and should be known to be, a man of upstanding character, President Bush should nominate another to lead the Defense Department.

If he does not, the full Senate should reject the nomination.

[From Defense News, Feb. 6, 1989]

TOWER SHOULD STEP ASIDE

Mr. John Tower should withdraw his name from consideration to be defense secretary of the United States. It would be a service to the country and to the president. Withdrawal would be the act of a seasoned politician who understands that the best interests of the nation sometimes require personal sacrifice by those who would help lead it.

Withdrawal is necessary because the record of Mr. Tower's professional life raises substantive doubt that he can perform with utmost effectiveness at a time when defense priorities and the Defense Department each are undergoing periods of vital, but dedicate, change.

The nation's ability to mount a robust defense depends, over the long term, on the support of the American people. Support for defense spending is declining. The public is raising legitimate questions about the relationship between the Defense Department and the defense industry. Further, defense no longer is the nation's top priority as was the case in 1981 when President Reagan accelerated the defense buildup begun by his predecessor. Today, defense is one of a number of national priorities, which include reduction of the federal deficit and improvement of the nation's trade balance.

What is needed is a defense secretary with the political skills to raise public confidence in the Pentagon and the acquisition process. He should have the vision to unite NATO's quarrelsome allies and address their changing and diverging defense priorities in light of Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev's entreaties. The new secretary must possess the diplomatic and leadership skills to build an international consenses for the president's defense agenda.

While in the Senate, Mr. Tower earned a reputation as a tough, abrasive deal maker. Even his allies do not characterize him as one much interested in the opposing views of others. He demonstrated little interest in improving the acquisition system or in balancing the appetites of former Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger with other, equally important, needs of the nation.

But it is his job since 1986 as a defense consultant that is most troubling. In about two years, Mr. Tower earned $1 million as a consultant for Rockwell International, Martin Marietta, LTV, Texton, British Aerospace, Aerotech and Hicks and Associates, a consulting firm that advises, among others, the Northrop Corp. These firms are makers of the B-1 and B-2 bombers, the MX and Midgetman missiles, and a wide array of the Pentagon's most important conventional weapons.

Sen. Sam Nunn, chairman of the Armed Service Committee, summarized the issue this way. "Frankly, the difficulty here is not the fact that you have worked for a defense contractor or been a consultant" but that Mr. Tower represented "five or six or seven of the major corporations . . . If you were to [excuse] yourself from [Pentagon discussions involving] all of them, you couldn't be secretary of defense . . . We have a perception problem. The question of conflict is one that usually relates to continuing financial interests. The other is perception . . . I know you to be an honest person. But I do worry about the perception."

The senator worries because he knows that today's public perception is tomorrow's political reality. That is why President Bush established ethics in government as a priority of his administration. After 24 years in the Senate, Mr. Tower also understands the link between the public's perception and its support for defense. His decision to become a defense consultant was an explicit statement about the the path he had chosen for himself.

The principle task of the next defense secretary is to build public confidence that the Pentagon is being well managed and that defense dollars are being carefully spent. The defense secretary must be an independent voice of force, authority and reason.

There is ample reason to doubt whether Mr. Tower is the man for these times.

[From the Air Force Times, Feb. 20, 1989]

NOT TOWER

The armed forces are under great pressure. They are being forced to find ways to hold down spending without endangering the nation, and they must rebuild public trust in the flawed procurement system. To do this, they need a strong, widely respected leader.

John G. Tower is the wrong man for the job.

Let's set aside for the moment the questions that have been raised about his drinking habits and his relationships with women. And let's even assume that the most recent FBI investigation into his financial affairs yields no evidence of illegality. There are other, compelling reasons Tower should not be secretary of defense.

It is clear that defense spending will be constrained and that the secretary of defense will have to engage in intricate and delicate negotiations with Congress and within the executive branch. To assure that the resources devoted to defense are adequate, but not excessive, the nation needs a Pentagon leader who is credible.

Tower is not. He has accepted more than three-quarters of a million dollars in payments from U.S. defense contractors for various consulting services he has rendered to them since he retired from the Senate.

In testimony before his former colleagues, he has offered to "rescue" himself—that is, not be involved in—certain decisions involving projects with which he was directly associated. But that is not a feasible solution. It would mean, in effect, that every time such a project required a decision by the secretary of defense, he would have to leave the room. That's no way to run the Pentagon, especially now, when excruciatingly difficult decisions must be made. There is too much at stake to allow vital decisions to be handled by underlings because the secretary of defense's chair is empty.

Unfortunately, Tower's lack of credibility is not limited to income on which he worked as a consultant, and that is the most significant problem.

Tower is so closely associated with the defense industry that many people will question virtually any statement he makes on defense issues. His supporters argue that Tower knows defense issues and he knows Congress. That is true. But this knowledge is worthless if it is perceived to be tainted by him.

Why should the people of the United States accept as the leader of their defenses a man whose effectiveness has been impaired by his past? Surely there is one person among the 250 million Americans who is both qualified to be Secretary of Defense and unfettered by ties to the defenses industry?

Tower's nomination shows poor judgment by President Bush. It should be withdrawn. Failing that, it should be rejected.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent on behalf of myself, Senators DOLE, WARNER, WILSON, MCCAIN, LOTT, THURMOND, WALLOP, GORTON, and COATS that the following document be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE
Washington, DC, March 2, 1989.

Mr. PATRICK A. TUCKER,
Minority Counsel, Senate Armed Services Committee, Senate Russell Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. TUCKER: This is in response to your request of this morning for information regarding retired Air Force Technical Sergeant Robert ("Bob") Jackson.

Air Force records, as read to me telephonically this afternoon, reveal the following:

One "Bob" Jackson, DOB 6 May 1934, was assigned to Bergstrom Air Force Base from February 1976 until April 1978.

Sergeant Jackson's first duty day at Bergstrom was 21 February 1976. His last duty day was 16 March 1977. On 21 March 1977 Sergeant Jackson was referred to Wilfred Hall Medical Center for medical supervision and subsequently was placed on the Temporary Disability Retired List following medical and psychological evaluation.

The Physical Evaluation Board which evaluated Sergeant Jackson concluded, inter alia, that Sergeant Jackson exhibited symptoms of a mixed personality disorder with anti-social themes and hysterical features. Air Force records indicate that following 21 March 1977 Sergeant Jackson was unable to perform his duties as an information specialist. He was retired from the Air Force at the grade of E-6 on 19 April 1978.

Sincerely,

ANNE N. FOREMAN,
General Counsel.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection it is so ordered.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I rise in support of the Tower nomination. I must admit I am rather puzzled by what has transpired, all that I have read in the newspaper accounts, all that I have heard on the floor and heard from the Senate Armed Services Committee. The reason I am puzzled is because I have served in this body for going on 15 years. The Senate is not a large group of people. It is only 100 of us.

With the nature of our work and the legislative process on committees, late-night sessions here on the floor, all-night sessions in some cases, as well as traveling together various places around the world, we do get to know each other rather well after a period of time. When I hear about these alcohol charges, I must admit I am rather surprised. I have heard others say that they are aware of colleagues in the Senate who have had alcohol problems. I too am aware of those over these last 14 years, some who have appeared on the floor, particularly at late-night sessions, with obvious problems, and it becomes fairly general knowledge among us as to those colleagues who have alcohol problems.

I served with John Tower for a decade. For that entire decade I served with him on the Senate Banking Committee. He was the ranking Republican on that committee when I first was here. I also had the privilege of serving with him on the Armed Services Committee when he was the ranking Republican on that particular committee. I had the opportunity to travel to the Soviet Union with him during the days of the SALT II debates, and I traveled with John Tower during the summer of 1972 when he and I were in various cities around this country debating Paul Warnke and representatives of the Carter administration on the merits or demerits of the SALT II Treaty.

So my point is I have seen him on the floor. I have seen him in social situations. I have served on two committees with him for a decade. I traveled around the world with him, to many social events, and I am amazed that I am not aware, absolutely not aware that there was a supposed problem or ever seen him in a drunken state. That has been the testimony of most of my colleagues. If he had this alcohol problem we hear so much about, I am amazed that he could hide it from so many people who are close associates for so many years.

My point is I simply do not believe from my personal observation that he has an alcohol problem and the unsubstantiated charges in an FBI report. And some of those witnesses hardly have great character of their own if you want to read the rest of the report and look at their particular credibility.

And so I really am puzzled, as I started to say, where this great alcohol problem came from if none of us who served with him on a very close and intimate basis ever observed it. And yet some in this body to this day, we are well aware, have a problem. We are aware of it. I would certainly be the last person to mention any names on this floor or off the floor. But there is a double standard going on that I am very disappointed in after all these years in the Senate; that we are trying a former colleague, who served this Senate for 24 years in a very distinguished manner and served his country and his State well now, through rumor and innuendo and unsubstantiated charges; that those are more important than our personal observations. It is very, very puzzling to me.

I will not take more time of the Senate at this time, but I certainly wholeheartedly support John Tower's nomination for Secretary of Defense. I think he would be as fine a Secretary as this country has had because of his background and experience. I think in order to clean up some of the problems of defense and get more for our money down there, make it more efficient, improve the procurement process and all of that, it takes someone who has been on the inside, who understands the establishment, who can make those changes. But to see his character assassinated, to see him abused the way he has been in the press can only be called the most unfair treatment of an individual that I have seen in the 14 years that I have served in the Senate. But when the time comes that we do finally cast our vote, I will be happy to cast my vote for John Tower.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I want to respond to my good friend from Utah by saying that John Tower says himself he had a problem back in those days we are talking about when he served here. He has acknowledged that, acknowledged publicly I believe that his wife he was about to marry made some demands to reduce the drinking. That has been said publicly, to cut back in those years. So it is not us saying that. It is not the FBI report saying that. It is him saying that himself, so I will use that as authority.

Mr. GARN. If the Senator will yield, I am aware——

Mr. GLENN. I yield the floor.

Mr. GARN. I am aware of that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Utah.

Mr. GARN. It seems to me a problem of alcohol abuse usually has some evidence in performance, and I would suggest the Senator from Ohio would certainly not be able to indicate—we were sworn in the same day at the same moment in 1974. If he did have a problem by his own admission, I never observed it, but I certainly never observed it in any way impairing his ability to do his job as a U.S. Senator at any time. I have heard no testimony by anyone to that effect, that John Tower's ability was ever impaired.

Mr. GLENN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GARN. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. GLENN. I hate to get into these graduations of alcohol abuse and treatment. I am not implying that John Tower is an alcoholic. But just in response to the comment of not having observed an alcohol problem—and I am not referring to him specifically, but if there is one thing that people in the alcohol abuse field are well aware of, it is that there are all different kinds of drinking patterns. There are people who have to nip, all day, every day. There are people who drink once every few weeks; they are episodic drinkers. There are people who have gone through treatment centers, they are back out, they are off for 6 months, then they go start up again. If there is one thing that is consistent in the whole alcohol abuse field, it is that there is no one pattern.

We had a series of hearings in Governmental Affairs last year, because I think the alcohol problem is getting to be enormous in this country. Half the deaths on the highways, are alcohol related, and you can go on and on. I am not implying this to Senator Tower. Please do not misinterpret me. But this idea that it is OK to go to white wine or that we have not seen him drunk and not able to perform, that there is not an abuse problem, which he now says he had back in the seventies, I just cannot excuse that. I cannot say that he did not have a problem because we did not see it here on the Senate floor.

Drinking problems take a multitude of forms. They are not all the types that we would have noticed here on the floor. I did not know Betty Ford had a problem, did not know Kitty Dukakis had a problem at all. I am not around them every day obviously, but as I understand most people around them were not aware of it either and yet they finally knew it was getting a grip on their lives and they went and did something about it, to their everlasting credit.

So as to this business that just because we did not see it here, there was not a problem, when he now says there was a problem, he acknowledges, back in those days, I go by his acknowledgement.

I yield the floor.

Mr. GARN. I would note that the Senator from Ohio is talking in the past tense, had. It is now 1989. I do not know that too many people in this life, if they were held accountable and responsible for their past, would be able to accomplish anything or be trusted. But we are greatly exaggerating what was in the FBI report. We are pillorying a man who is capable and qualified to serve his country well. We are applying a double standard.

We can talk about Senators who do not have the nuclear button. Well, neither does a Secretary of Defense. Only the President has that nuclear button. I could get into, which I do not intend to do, with my good friend and fellow astronaut from Ohio, that kind of discussion but we could talk about some Presidents who had some problems while they were in the Oval Office that did have the red button there for them. I just think we are applying a double, unfair standard to a well-qualified individual. Some of us happen to believe in the principle of repentance in any event.

Mr. GLENN. One of the points I made in my remarks was that the Department of Defense is different. It is different than being on the floor of the Senate. There is a double standard. Our confirmation process starts with the people back home. It comes from the election process.

Mr. GARN. The public elects a lot of drunks to public office.

Mr. GLENN. No. 2, the military has a very strict system. They will not let anyone deal with nuclear weapons unless they have been through the PRP. It is very strict. The No. 1 disqualifying item is alcohol abuse. Now, there is not any doubt that the pattern that I read out of those FBI reports is that this problem is not all in the past.

There are problems in that FBI report that are much more current than that. I am not quoting from it so we do not get back into the quagmire we were in about an hour ago. But the problem is you have to make a judgment call. Is it all in the past or not? I judge from what I read that it is not all in the past. The Senator has read this report and obviously has come to a different conclusion.

But I do not think in the military with the timeliness that is required—it may be minutes—and the consequences of a mistake are the reasons why the military has the very strict selection program. I do not think you can require less of a Secretary of Defense. That is the reason I come down the way I do.

Mr. GARN. We obviously have——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would indicate to the Senator from Utah that we have a previous order to set aside the nomination at 6 o'clock. Do you wish to continue?

Mr. GARN. I ask unanimous consent to continue for 1 minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GARN. To complete my thought, we obviously have a difference of opinion. Both of us served in the military, and I am not capable to argue the shades of alcoholism as I am sure the Senator from Ohio is not as well.

I will simply conclude by saying I still believe that Senator Tower has been treated very unfairly, that he is capable and qualified to be Secretary of Defense, and that I have nothing in my personal experience or from others that I have heard that would disqualify him from this position.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, regarding the Tower nomination, I am very much in the undecided column on this issue. I do have some concerns, but they are not about the personal items discussed in the press but, rather, my concern is over the issue of cleaning up the defense procurement mess, or what I consider the defense procurement mess, in the Pentagon.

I wrote a letter to President Bush a few days after the election, urging that a Secretary of Defense with a different philosophy be appointed—someone from outside the normal industrial-military complex.

It has been my strongest feeling for many years that we need to break the cycle of the revolving door between the defense contractor corporations and the Pentagon. This is no way reflects badly upon John Tower's character, but rather, to me, there is nothing in his record that seems to indicate he would be a reform-minded Secretary insofar as this area is concerned. However, I am keeping an open mind and was slightly encouraged by his remarks of yesterday.

I am very concerned about how our next Defense Secretary will affect the effectiveness of defense programs and systems. I am very concerned that we have efficiency. A B-1B bomber crashed near Rapid City, SD. I do not know if that was because of defective parts, a defective communication system, or what caused it. The official report said "pilot error." I really cannot judge. But if any of these problems were the fault of the defense contractor, I want a Defense Secretary who is able to punish the wrongdoer and get the problem fixed.

There is a belief in my State, at least, that the $500 hammers and coffeemakers and defective parts that have been brought to the fore need to be corrected.

I hope out of this debate something positive will come, and that is that the American people want us to be more accountable about spending the defense dollar. They want a dollar's worth of return for a dollar spent.

They also are very concerned that we clean up what I call the contractors' mess. Perhaps the best way to do this, or at least I suggested this early in November, is to have someone from completely outside the normal military-industrial group.

But I continue to struggle with this decision. I want to support my President, but my reservations over this nominee remain. It will be a difficult decision for me, and I plan to keep an open mind.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, when I was asked last December about the nomination of former Senator John Tower as Secretary of Defense, I said that while he would not be my choice for the position, Senator Tower deserved the benefit of the doubt unless his confirmation hearings produced information which should disqualify him from serving as Secretary of Defense. I am now convinced, after following the hearings very closely, and reading the FBI background check on the nominee, that John Tower should not be confirmed as the Secretary of Defense.

My concern about this nomination first centers on testimony regarding Senator Tower's close association with major defense contractors. Since leaving the Senate in 1985 and then serving as a U.S. Arms Control negotiator in Geneva, Senator Tower has received approximately $750,000 from defense contractors, and is considered one of the premier defense industry lobbyists in the country. Senator Tower's extensive involvement with five major defense contractor's places him in the position of having to recuse himself from consideration of many Pentagon projects, including important strategic programs such as the B-1 bomber. This situation would make more difficult the already challenging job of reforming an archaic and anticompetitive defense procurement system.

I am further troubled by the fact that Tower advertises himself as a born-again Pentagon reformer, while at the same time, dismissing the Pentagon procurement scandals as trivial. Tower once said, "I think if you look at all of the waste, fraud, and abuse that is the result of mismanagement or neglect or malfeasance within the Department, it would amount to a startlingly low figure."

During the Reagan administration, the Defense Department committed itself to a myriad of new weapon systems. The new Secretary of Defense will face budget constraints that will necessitate critical strategic decisions. Costly programs such as the B-2 (Stealth) bomber and the MX and Midgetman missile systems need to be reevaluated and prioritized. Some programs will need to be canceled, and others will need to be deferred. The Secretary of Defense should play an integral and decisive role in these decisions, and I question how a Secretary who must recuse himself from many of these deliberations can effectively serve his Department, his President and his country in this capacity.

Second, the background investigation of Senator Tower conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation produced hundreds of pages of comment on Senator Tower's use of alcohol, relations with women and dealings with defense contractors. This material prompted one White House official to tell the Washington Post that the volume of derogatory statements on Tower's drinking habits and relations with women was such that if Tower were seeking a job as an FBI agent rather than the position of Secretary of Defense, he would not be hired.

In addition, the Department of Defense has very strict regulations concerning the use of alcohol. Under these regulations, Senator Tower would not be allowed to command a missile wing, a SAC bomber squadron or a Trident missile submarine. In fact, Senator Tower would not qualify to command any of the divisions at Ellsworth, AFB, in South Dakota. The Secretary of Defense is, as Senator Nunn has said, the "Deputy Commander-in-Chief" and needs to be prepared to carry out his military command responsibilities 24 hours a day. I find it very difficult to ask the servicemen and women of this country to respect as their leader a Secretary of Defense who could not meet the minimum standards to which they are held.

Finally, and perhaps most importantly, Senator Tower is not the best person for this job and does not meet the President's own clearly stated standard of ethical leadership. President Bush says he wants all his nominees to "bend over backwards" to be above even the perception of impropriety. Regrettably, Senator Tower falls far short of this standard.

Aside from the complex challenge of managing 2 million active service personnel and governing a $300 billion budget, the Secretary of Defense must be a leader. The Secretary must have the credibility and respect of the servicemen and women in our Armed Forces in order to inspire and challenge each and every one of them. The Secretary should not be held to minimum standards of conduct and propriety, but to the maximum standard of honor and integrity.

This is not a partisan debate, and we should not waive our constitutional right to advise and consent—as many of our Republican colleagues are urging—merely because Senator Tower is the President's choice for the nomination. Presidential prerogative is simply not enough to overcome the deficiencies of this nomination.

We are standing on the edge of a new world of strategic relations. Rapidly changing technology, national insecurities, domestic economic imperatives, and unique opportunities for arms control agreements make this one of the most dangerous and challenging periods in Pentagon history. To meet this challenge, the Secretary of Defense must not only understand security and defense issues. He must also recognize our new financial constraints, boldly deal with potential corruption in the procurement process and, most importantly, be of unimpeachable personal integrity. These criteria are necessary to assure the absolutely essential confidence of the American people and lead the Department of Defense into the 1990's.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CRANSTON. What is pending now in the Senate, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, this nomination will be temporarily laid aside.

VETERANS' AFFAIRS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the nomination of Edward J. Derwinski to be Secretary of Veterans' Affairs.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Edward J. Derwinski, of Illinois, to be Secretary of the Department of Veterans' Affairs.

The Senate proceeded to consider the nomination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from California.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I bring before the Senate the recommendation of the Veterans' Affairs Committee that the President's nominee for the first Secretary of Veterans Affairs—former Representative Edward J. Derwinski—be confirmed in that position and as Administrator of Veterans' Affairs until March 15. Our committee met on this matter earlier today and voted unanimously—11 to 0—in support of this recommendation.

INAUGURATION OF NEW ERA

Mr. President, as the Senate considers the nomination of the first Secretary of Veterans Affairs, I am struck by how historic an occasion this is in the annals of veterans affairs in our Nation. It is a day for which so many have labored so long and hard and with such great tenacity. I think particularly of my distinguished colleague from South Carolina, Mr. THURMOND, whose bill was the vehicle last year in the Senate for action to raise the VA to Cabinet-level status.

So, this day clearly marks the inauguration of a new era in veterans affairs.

BACKGROUND OF NOMINEE

Mr. President, as many of our colleagues know, Ed Derwinski represented the Fourth District of Illinois in the House of Representatives from 1958 until 1982 and, since 1983, has held consecutively two Presidential appointments at the Department of State, Counselor until 1987, and thereafter, Under Secretary of State for Security Assistance, Science and Technology. He is a World War II veteran, having served in the Army in the Pacific theater. During Ed's time in the Congress, he developed a reputation for expertise both in foreign relations matters, through his service on the Foreign Affairs Committee and in matters relating to the Federal Civil Service, through his service on the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee on which he was the ranking Republican member and a major force in enacting the Civil Service Reform Act of 1978.

QUALIFICATIONS OF THE NOMINEE

In yesterday's confirmation hearing, I described Ed Derwinski's qualifications in the following terms prior to his testimony:

Ed, I suspect that your many years in Congress have given you valuable skills to bring to bear in the high position for which you have been nominated.

First, by virtue of your efforts on behalf of your constituents over the many years in the House, I know you have gained a strong sense of the vital importance that the VA plays in so many peoples' lives—whether in the form of a benefits check or access to high-quality health care or to any of the many other services and benefits that the VA furnishes. And I know that your recognition of that importance can make the task of maintaining and strengthening that system of veterans benefits and services that much more meaningful to you.

Second, it is obvious that your extensive experience with the Civil Service system can be a great asset in connection with the Federal Government's second largest employer. I don't have to tell you that a department with over 250,000 employees needs to have a strong program for understanding and meeting the needs of its employees. The VA, in a very real sense, is its employees. All of the services, all of the benefits ultimately depend on the efforts of a qualified and committed work force. Over my many years of working on VA issues, I have developed a very high regard for the work and dedication of VA employees, and I hope you will be as impressed in your visits to facilities throughout the system.

Although your long experience in the foreign relations field may not be obviously relevant to the VA, I think your experience there can be of assistance. As you know only too well—both from your work in the Congress and now from your years at the State Department—the essence of success in the field of foreign relations is the ability to recognize and respect competing interests and then to seek to develop a balance between such interests so as to find an appropriate resolution. The art of negotiation that you have honed over the years could be invaluable both inside the VA and in representing the VA in the Cabinet and elsewhere.

With reference to this final point of negotiation, Ed Derwinski has often stressed the importance of bringing the Executive and Legislative Branches together. It is my very strong sense that we who work on veterans matters do our very best work when we work in a bipartisan fashion and do so with cooperation between the two Houses of Congress and between the Congress and the Executive Branch. I sincerely look forward to that kind of a bipartisan relationship with Ed, assuming his confirmation.

CERTAIN CONTROVERSIAL ISSUES RELATING TO THE NOMINEE

Mr. President, I want to address the way in which certain controversial issues relating to this nomination have been investigated by the Committee and the chronology and extent of that effort. I note at the outset that Senator FRANK MURKOWSKI, the committee's ranking minority member, and I have worked extremely closely, cooperatively, and amicably throughout the process of trying to secure answers to a number of difficult questions.

It was on December 22 that then-President-elect Bush announced his intention to nominate former Representative Derwinski to be the first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs. Shortly thereafter, I asked committee staff to begin to determine the nominee's record on veterans matters while in Congress and generally to gather necessary background information, including the record of his two prior confirmation hearings before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, so that the committee could proceed with the confirmation hearing in a timely fashion.

Mr. President, as some of my colleagues may know, the Oakland Tribune published an editorial about the nominee on December 28, 1988. This editorial charged the nominee with a "record of service in an organization riddled with former Nazi collaborators" and raised questions about "his alleged role in passing United States secrets to the South Korean CIA in the late 1970's." Subsequently, there were two front page stories in the Los Angeles Times, on January 12 and 14, both of which focused on the second matter, the issue of the unauthorized disclosure of information in 1977 to the South Korean Government about one of its intelligence agent's planned defection. The first of these articles reported, apparently for the first time in the press, that the nominee, during a March 10, 1983, hearing of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on his nomination to the position of Counselor at the State Department, had acknowledged providing the information in 1977. We confirmed this the next day when the Foreign Relations Committee provided us with the transcript of that hearing that was recovered from the Archives at our request.

KCIA DEFECTOR ISSUE

This matter centers on an event which took place in September 1977 during an investigation by the House Subcommittee on International Relations into matters relating to United States-Korean relations, particularly in light of the so-called Koreagate affair which, among other things, involved attempts by Korean officials unlawfully to influence Members of Congress. The chairman of the subcommittee was Representative Donald Fraser; Representative Derwinski was the ranking minority member, and he had opposed the subcommittee investigation which he stated was inappropriately impairing our relations with a U.S. ally.

On September 13, 1977, Representative Fraser received word that an agent of the Korean CIA who was stationed in New York City was interested in remaining in the United States and would testify before the subcommittee if arrangements could be made for him to receive protection. On September 15, the KCIA agent traveled to the Washington, DC, area and met with subcommittee staff. It was planned at that time that the agent would leave his job and defect to the United States early the next week. Later that day, the subcommittee staff briefed the rest of the staff and Representatives Fraser and Derwinski and perhaps one other Member.

The next day, September 16, the subcommittee staff learned that the Korean Government had learned that one of its KCIA agents was planning to defect and that the KCIA was seeking to locate the agent in question. As a result of subcommittee staff efforts, the FBI took the KCIA agent into custody on the evening of the 16th prior to the arrival of the KCIA at the defector's home.

Because providing information about the KCIA agent to the Korean Government could have constituted an obstruction of justice, the FBI began an investigation into the disclosure. Subsequently, a Federal grand jury in late 1977 heard testimony on the disclosure issue but returned no indictments. Representative Derwinski was called to testify before the grand jury. He told our committee that in response to questions from the grand jury he invoked the speech and debate clause and gave no answers to the questions asked.

In January 1978, then Attorney General Bell wrote to Speaker O'Neill to provide information gathered by the Department of Justice during its investigation of the disclosure issue. Speaker O'Neill referred that material to the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct—the House Ethics Committee—which carried out an investigation. In October 1978, that committee completed its effort and issued a press release which stated that the committee had "voted unanimously to take no further action after the subcommittee determined that there was insufficient evidence to sustain a Statement of Alleged Violation against any one of 15 or more possible suspects."

In 1983, in connection with his confirmation hearing before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee for the position of Counselor at the Department of State, Representative Derwinski admitted, apparently for the first time, that he had provided information about the KCIA agent to a Korean official in 1977. On March 10, 1983, at the hearing Representative Derwinski testified as follows: "[W]ithout giving matters any serious thought, after having been notified by the staff that there was in effect a defection procedure, I just casually related that to one of the officials at the South Korean Embassy."

On March 1 and 2, 1989, Representative Derwinski indicated to our committee that he "just blurted out" the information to an official of the Korean Embassy during a chance meeting outside of the Longworth House Office Building. He further indicated that he had no intent at that time of in any way obstructing the ongoing investigation of the House Subcommittee or of putting the KCIA agent in jeopardy and that he had made the disclosure to apprise the South Korean Government—with whom, as an ally of the United States, he maintained a very close relationship—that they were going to have to deal, in the near future, with a KCIA defector testifying before the subcommittee. He further stated that he "should not" have made the disclosure. He termed it "dumb" to have done so.

Mr. President, in order to try to understand as much as possible about this KCIA-defection matter, the committee staff and I undertook an extensive investigation, which is outlined in some detail in a document which I will ask be placed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. As part of that effort, committee staff and I, together or separately, met with or spoke with many individuals, including Members and former Members of Congress, and we had two lengthy meetings with the nominee—focusing, first, on the efforts in 1977 of the House Subcommittee on International Relations; second, on activities in 1977 and 1978 relating to the impact of the leak and investigations into the source of it; third, on the 1983 Senate Foreign Relations Committee's confirmation hearing; and, fourth, on the nominee's statements about what he had done in 1977.

As part of these investigatory efforts, I wrote a number of letters on the matter—to President Bush, the Attorney General, the Counsel to the President, and the House Committee on Standards of Conduct—and submitted two sets of prehearing questions to the nominee specifically on this matter, and he has responded to each under oath. All of these letters and replies and the prehearing questions and answers were made public yesterday and will be printed in the hearing record. Committee staff have reviewed many materials relating to the issue, including materials relating to other committees' involvement in various aspects of the matter and numerous press reports. The nominee's published writings have also been studied.

Finally, on Tuesday of this week, the committee held an extensive closed meeting to discuss certain classified and sensitive information arising out of the FBI background investigation and to talk with the nominee about certain parts of that information. I discussed with all members of the committee my very serious concerns about certain aspects of the KCIA matter and heard the concerns of other members. We then questioned the nominee under oath for an hour and a half. Yesterday, our Committee held a hearing at which these matters were again discussed with the nominee who testified under oath for 2½ hours.

As I noted earlier, I have felt an obligation for our Committee to pursue in a thorough, fair, and judicious manner all material issues that arose as to this historic nomination. I believe that the chronology that I have outlined and that is set forth in detail in the document that I will be inserting in the RECORD demonstrates how I sought to fulfill that responsibility.

Mr. President, I want to stress that the investigation we have conducted has been both intensive and extensive and has stretched over many weeks. Some very serious questions developed in the course of our inquiry, and I have felt, in fairness to the nominee, that it was necessary that neither I nor staff make any public statements about those questions. We have felt strongly that his reputation and record should not be sullied by rumors or innuendo.

It was only on Tuesday morning that, after reviewing certain highly classified materials, I was able to put to rest in my mind one very salient question I had about the nature of the communication to the Koreans. In many instances, our search for evidence in this area has been like looking for a proverbial needle in the haystack.

But I am convinced that we have exhausted all available avenues of exploration, including efforts to obtain access in a timely fashion to the records of a 1977 grand jury that looked into the disclosure issue. I want to note further that our extensive inquiry has caused some to misunderstand the nature of our concern and effort and to criticize our efforts. I reject any such criticism and feel very strongly that our very thorough and painstaking process was necessary and appropriate, and that the serious questions we felt it necessary to consider so fully were real and highly germane.

Moreover, there has been totally unwarranted criticism of the Committee majority staff's efforts in this matter, all of which have been carried out at my direction, with my specific approval, and with my full knowledge. I am confident that there have been no leaks. Nor will there be.

Mr. President, we sought, for two reasons, to carry out our inquiry and get much information prior to the committee's hearing in documentary form: First, to give the nominee a chance to respond in a thorough and considered and fully accountable form to certain difficult questions; and, second, to seek to have the hearing on the nomination, as much possible, focus on programmatic issues involving the Department of Veterans Affairs.

EXPLANATION OF VOTE

Mr. President, before explaining my affirmative vote on the nominee I want to discuss my general position on Cabinet nominees and how that was applied in this case.

Generally, I believe that a President should be allowed to appoint those he pleases to be his top advisers. I have seldom opposed confirmation of a Cabinet nominee. There are no clear guidelines for the exercise of the advice-and-consent function in this respect. It is a matter of conscience for each Senator.

My criteria are that, in general, I would vote against a Presidential nomination of a person to serve at the pleasure of the President—as distinguished from a life-time or term appointment—only on two general grounds: One relating to policy viewpoints, and one relating to behavioral standards. Under the first, I would oppose a nominee if he or she had evidenced policy views fundamentally at variance with the functions and responsibilities of the particular office or did not embrace the basic philosophy underlying the position. In the area of behavioral standards, I would oppose a nomination if the personal or professional behavior of the nominee or potential conflicts of interest involving the nominee convinces me that he or she is not fit to assume a high office of Government.

I have made one general exception to these criteria for Presidential advisers—I have always contended that these minimal standards do not apply to nominations for Attorney General of the United States. Because of the special role of the Attorney General as the chief law enforcement officer of the United States, I have generally applied more stringent criteria—similar to those associated with Federal judicial nominations.

In the case of this nomination, I believe there is no disqualification of Mr. Derwinski on the basis of his policy views or understanding of the responsibilities of the office to which he has been nominated. He has responded in a generally forthright and—with some exceptions as to issues on which he felt he had not had enough time to form a knowledgeable opinion—responsive manner to the many prehearing questions posed to him. He has already evidenced that he is willing—if not yet effective in doing so—to advocate the needs of veterans to the President.

However, I do believe that Mr. Derwinski's actions and statements in connection with the 1977 defection of a South Korean intelligence officer raise serious ethical questions.

I want to stress that I wanted to be very positive about the nomination of the first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs. At the same time, as I have indicated, I have felt and feel a special responsibility, as chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, to scrutinize very carefully this historic nomination for the first head of the VA to sit in the President's Cabinet. I felt and feel that this obligation is independent of any scrutiny that any other committee or other entity has given any relevant matter pertaining to this nominee. Our committee is the only one in the Congress which has been charged with the responsibility of making a recommendation to the Senate as to whether or not this nominee should be confirmed to head the second or third largest department in our Government and to sit in the Cabinet of the President of the United States.

Mr. Derwinski has been confirmed twice before by the Senate for positions in the Department of State. It serves no purpose to rehash now whether in 1983—in connection with the first such nomination—the members of the Foreign Relations Committee were actually aware of all of the pre-1983 facts before us now. I know that I, for one, was not, and the record shows that only five members were present at the March 10, 1983 hearing. In any event, that was then and this is now, and there is of course no doubt that the Foreign Relations Committee did not have before it Mr. Derwinski's statements in 1989 about his role in this matter.

In any case, what another committee did or did not do earlier does not alter the responsibility of our committee or the Senate to reach a judgment on the nominee's fitness for the position to which he is now nominated.

Nor do I believe that what transpired in the course of the investigations by the grand jury or House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct is dispositive here. We sought with mixed success to gain access to the records of those inquiries.

As to the 1977 grand jury proceedings, the Justice Department advised that the Attorney General had rejected the request, made by myself and Senators MURKOWSKI and SPECTER, to petition the district court to give this committee access to all the grand jury notes, minutes, and other materials relating to Mr. Derwinski in order to assist the Senate in carrying out its constitutional advice-and-consent responsibilities. The Senate's legal counsel advised that without Justice Department participation there was no likelihood that a petition to the court would be successful.

Although there is no public report of the grand jury, it was widely reported in the press that the grand jury's failure to proceed against Mr. Derwinski was due to the need to protect intelligence sources and methods and that the grand jury issued a negative report regarding his actions which the judge sealed. Based on all the information available to me, those press reports seem credible. I certainly find no basis for concluding that Mr. Derwinski, who testified to our committee, as I indicated earlier, that he invoked the speech and debate clause in order to answer no questions during his appearance before the grand jury, was in any way exonerated because he was not indicted.

As to the 1978 House Ethics Committee investigation, that committee assured us that the only documents in its records are news clips, a press release, and a January 24, 1978, classified letter to Speaker O'Neill from then Attorney General Bell. That committee did not make them available, but we obtained access to those documents separately. I discussed this matter with the Representative who headed that probe and am satisfied that that committee was unable to act because of the need to protect intelligence sources and methods—not because it did not have evidence of inappropriate conduct by Mr. Derwinski.

Hence, I find neither of these aborted investigations dispositive of the issues we must confront in considering this nomination. And so we have proceeded, in cooperation with our ranking minority member, as I have outlined, to carry out a very thorough investigation into and scrutiny of the nominee's actions and statements in connection with the 1977 defection issue.

After reviewing in depth and at length all of the background information provided by the White House on Mr. Derwinski, including some highly classified information, his 1983 testimony to the Foreign Relations Committee, certain materials obtained from the Justice Department, and written and oral statements made by the nominee in response to prehearing written questions and to me in the course of two meetings in my office, I reached a conclusion on the KCIA issue and its relationship to whether Mr. Derwinski should be confirmed as the first Secretary of Veteran's Affairs.

There is no question that Mr. Derwinski made the communication in 1977. He admitted this in 1983 and to our committee now.

Mr. President, the bottom line is this: In my judgment, Mr. Derwinski made a significant mistake in 1977 in making the disclosure and since then on a number of occasions in dissembling as to what he had done. I find that these actions and statements raise significant ethical questions. I conclude that what he did in 1977 in making the disclosure was wrong and that the entire record demonstrates that he has often not been candid or forthcoming about it.

I cannot give details underlying the conclusions I have reached, due to the sensitive or classified nature of much of the material on which I have based my conclusions. However, I have weighed all of the evidence extremely carefully and I am confident that my conclusions are sound.

Were there a pattern of other such ethical lapses in Mr. Derwinski's history, I could not support his nomination. But his unfortunate actions and statements in connection with this one matter must be evaluated in the context of his entire record. When weighed against his 24 years of otherwise distinguished service in the Congress and almost 6 years of high-level work at the State Department without any blemish that we are aware of, I do not find his indiscretions as to this one incident to be disqualifying.

There is much positive in Ed Derwinski's record of public service—much to be justifiably proud of. I have received many good comments from his former colleagues about his character and capacity. Hence, I am optimistic about his potential to rise above this unattractive episode, to put it behind him once and for all—perhaps the wiser for it—and to move forward constructively and positively to make America a better place for those who have kept America strong and free.

ALLEGATIONS OF NAZI-FASCIST ASSOCIATIONS AND OTHER QUESTIONS

With reference to the charge raised in the Oakland Tribune editorial of alleged associations by the nominee with groups "riddled with former Nazi collaborators," we have looked into the assertions raised in the editorial and questioned the nominee under oath about this matter in person and in writing. The FBI has made a special supplemental report, at my request, on this allegation.

Based on what we learned in that process and from the nominee and the FBI investigation and assuming no further information on those charges is uncovered and I expect none to be, I am satisfied that the nominee has done nothing wrong in respect to this issue.

As to certain other questions regarding the KCIA matter, a conclusive adverse judgment cannot be sustained and I believe the nominee deserves the benefit of the doubt on those matters.

CONCLUSION

Thus, I will vote to confirm the nominee and urge my colleagues to do likewise.

Mr. President, as we do so today, I want to note that heading up the VA has always been a tough job. I think it will be even tougher in the future. First, the next person to head the VA will be the first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs. The change to a Cabinet-level Department will have many ramifications. Expectations for change and more resources will be high.

Second, the VA is in a very bad financial way just now. I am deeply concerned about its ability to continue to provide benefits and services in an acceptable manner unless this fiscal crisis is resolved. Trying to find the way out of the present fiscal thicket confronting the VA while recognizing and working in response to larger economic concerns will be no small challenge.

But, I am very hopeful that Ed Derwinski will be the right person to take charge of the VA at this critical juncture. In his answers to my prehearing questions and again yesterday in his prepared statement, the nominee expressed his very clear and strong intention to be an advocate for veterans within the administration and the Cabinet. It has not always been clear in the recent past that the head of the VA was fulfilling that role and I am delighted with Ed Derwinski's very forthright acceptance of that mandate.

Indeed, he has already been carrying the VA flag within the President's councils. He has requested, although thus far unsuccessfully, supplemental funding for VA programs for both fiscal year 1989 and 1990. Indeed, he joined with me and a number of Senators and Representatives yesterday evening in a meeting at the House Appropriations Subcommittee convened by House Veterans' Affairs Committee Chairman SONNY MONTGOMERY to press OMB Director Richard Darman on these points. I believe that this meeting will lead to a supplemental funding request for VA medical care—although in what amount, I am not clear.

As I have said on many occasions, I believe very strongly that the cost of veterans benefits—including its extensive health care system—is a continuing cost of providing for our Nation's defense. We must not be seen as being unwilling or unable to fulfill our commitment to those who have answered our country's call to service.

I also want to make special note of Mr. Derwinski's very constructive testimony yesterday in support of the provisions in Public Law 100-527, the Department of Veterans' Affairs Act, that I and Senator GLENN worked together to design to prevent the politicization of the new Department. I was particularly pleased with what the nominee had to say about this since this had long been a major concern of mine in connection with creating a new Cabinet-level Department, and one I addressed at length on the Senate floor on July 11, 1988, upon original Senate passage of that bill (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 17494) and later upon final Senate action on October 18, 1988, of the conference report (31483). I welcomed the nominee's pledge at the hearing to carry out his duties and run the Department in a nonpartisan fashion and his statement that he had told the White House he was not interested in any political placements in the Department.

With Senate action to confirm this nomination, I now look forward to getting down to business and working with Mr. Derwinski and his fine selection for Deputy Secretary, Tony Principi, in a cooperative, open fashion to meet our obligations to those who have defended the Nation in its hours of need.

Finally, I want to thank my friend, the committee's ranking minority member, Senator MURKOWSKI, for his great cooperation and assistance as we have worked together so closely and amicably on this nomination. I also thank Senator SPECTER for his great interest and involvement, and all of the other members of the committee as well, as we have worked together on this nomination.

Finally, I thank Bill Brew, Ed Scott, Jon Steinberg, Sharon Blackman, Claudia Kaskin, Charlotte Hughes, and Karen Paul for all of their enormous and very effective and conscientious efforts in assisting me on this nomination. I also thank the minority staff, particular Klan Ptak and Vic Reston, for their cooperation on this matter.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed at this point in the RECORD the document I mentioned earlier which sets forth a chronology of my efforts in connection with investigating the KCIA matter.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHRONOLOGY OF SENATOR CRANSTON'S ACTIVITIES REGARDING KCIA DISCLOSURE ISSUE

On January 4, I and Committee staff met with the nominee in my office for approximately one hour. On that same day, I wrote to President Bush, noting my meeting with the nominee and requesting that the FBI, as part of its customary background investigation, cover fully the charges raised in the Oakland Tribune editorial of December 28, 1988. I also asked that I have the opportunity to review the report of the FBI's investigation prior to the Committee's hearing on the nomination, which I noted I had tentatively set for late January or early February. I then scheduled the hearing for February 6.

Following publication of the Los Angeles Times January 12, 1989, article which was the first published report that the nominee had acknowledged to the Foreign Relations Committee in 1983 that in 1977 he had provided information about the KCIA defector to the Korean Government, I asked staff to contact the Office of the White House Counsel on my behalf to ask that the FBI report include, in addition to the 1989 investigation, material reflecting the FBI's involvement in this matter in 1977 and the FBI's full investigation in 1983 in connection with the nominee's confirmation as Counselor at the State Department.

During the week of January 16, I met, alone or with Committee staff, with members or former members who were involved with the House Subcommittee on International Relations activities in 1977, with the 1978 investigation by the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct—commonly known as the House "Ethics" Committee—or with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's confirmation hearing in 1983. During the same time frame and in subsequent weeks, the Committee staff located and spoke with staff or former staff involved with each of those Committees and their activities.

On January 17, I wrote to the Chairman of the House Ethics Committee requesting information from that Committee's files relating to its 1978 investigation. That Committee's January 24 response indicated that the only document in that Committee's files that might be relevant to our Committee's inquiry was a January 1978 letter from then Attorney General Bell to Speaker O'Neill, which included classified enclosures, and as to that document it was suggested that our Committee contact the Department of Justice.

On January 18, I submitted an initial set of pre-hearing questions to the nominee. He provided answers on January 25 and January 30.

On January 26, I again met with the nominee in my office for approximately 30 minutes.

On January 27, I wrote to the Attorney General requesting a copy of the 1978 letter from Attorney General Bell.

On January 30, I submitted follow-up pre-hearing questions dealing specifically with the KCIA defection issue. The nominee replied to those questions on February 2.

On February 2, I wrote to the nominee in further follow-up to his answers to certain pre-hearing questions, asking that he be prepared to respond to some of the questions at the Committee's forthcoming hearing on the FY 1990 VA Budget and to others before March 15, the effective date of the new Department of Veterans' Affairs. The nominee responded in a February 3 letter.

On February 2, I was notified that the report of the FBI's background investigation was complete and, early on February 3, I reviewed that report and accompanying materials for nearly two hours. Late that morning, I met with Senators Murkowski and Specter, the only other members of our Committee who had reviewed the FBI report at that time, to discuss certain matters raised by the report. Senator Murkowski and I agreed that the confirmation hearing scheduled for the following Monday would need to be postponed to enable the Committee to acquire and review more materials relating to the nominee.

At that point and subsequently, I met with and spoke with the White House Counsel, Boyden Gray, and his deputy counsel to request further information from the White House, the Department of Justice, and the FBI.

I then rescheduled the hearing for February 23, to follow the one-week February recess.

On February 6, Senator Murkowski and I wrote to the Chairman and Ranking Minority Member of the House Ethics Committee to renew our Committee's request to their Committee for a copy of the 1978 letter from Attorney General Bell. Finally, after an exchange of letters between the Ethics Committee and the Department of Justice, a copy of the Bell letter was made available by the Department of Justice in the early evening on February 9, and Committee staff and I reviewed it on February 10.

On February 9, following a series of discussions I had involving Senators Murkowski and Specter, Senator Murkowski and I wrote to Mr. Gray, requesting that Mr. Derwinski be given access to certain materials relating to the FBI report. Senator Specter had made a similar request in a letter of February 8. Also, following extensive staff consultation with the Office of Senate Legal Counsel, Senator Murkowski and I, with Senator Specter's support, asked that the Department of Justice be directed to seek disclosure of all records, notes, and materials pertaining to Mr. Derwinski generated by the 1977 Federal Grand Jury that was investigating the KCIA-agent disclosure.

In a February 14 reply, Mr. Gray answered that the White House had referred to the Justice Department our request that Mr. Derwinski be granted access to materials in the FBI report and our request that the Department seek access for our Committee to materials from the Grand Jury relating to Mr. Derwinski's testimony. Since receiving this reply, Committee staff and I have been working with the Department of Justice regarding our requests. Although the Department has advised that the Attorney General has decided not to seek the Grand Jury materials, the Department has been most forthcoming in all other respects. The Office of Senate Legal Counsel has advised us that without the support of the Department of Justice, there is no likelihood that the Committee could successfully acquire the Grand Jury materials.

On February 17, the nomination hearing, which was then scheduled for February 23, was rescheduled for March 1, because of scheduling conflicts.

Throughout this period of time, the Committee's Chief Counsel and Deputy General Counsel had innumerable conversations with the Justice Department, the House Ethics Committee staff, the White House Counsel's office, the Senate Legal Counsel's Office, the FBI, and VA representatives to try to facilitate access to the various materials.

On February 21 and 23, the Justice Department arranged access for Committee staff to certain important FBI interview reports from the 1977 investigation.

On February 21, I reviewed carefully the follow-up FBI material I had requested on the alleged Nazi relationship matter.

On February 21, 27, and 28, I reviewed again with great care the FBI report and associated materials.

On February 28, the Committee met in executive closed session for 3 hours to discuss certain classified and sensitive information included in the FBI report and to talk with the nominee about certain parts of that information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Alaska, Mr. MURKOWSKI.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I thank the Chair.

First of all, I want to echo many of the comments of my colleague, the senior Senator from California, and the chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee.

I feel the committee has worked very diligently in the manner in which the review of fitness of the nominee, Edward Derwinski, to be the first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs, was held.

We are here to vote on the nomination of Edward Derwinski to be the first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs.

The Senate Committee on Veterans' Affairs held its hearing yesterday during which the Members addressed Ed's experience, personal philosophy, and leadership skills. I believe that Ed clearly demonstrated that he has all the qualities he must possess in order to assume this highly responsible position. Earlier today the committee voted unanimously to recommend Ed's confirmation.

Ed has a long and distinguished record of public service.

From his 24 years in the Congress, he has acquired an appreciation for the procedures, customs, and values of this body.

From his 8 years at the State Department, he has acqui ed an in-depth understanding of the e ecutive branch and, I am certain, more experience than most, in difficult negotiations.

From a lifetime in Washington, he has established personal relationships with the Government leaders and decisionmakers who will shape the future of our country.

Ed's public service began long before he came to Washington. It began in his youth when he put on the U.S. Army uniform during World War II.

That service tells me a lot about Ed's character and commitment to our Nation.

It also confirms to America's veterans that he is one of them.

The committee yesterday also looked very carefully into the allegation made concerning his involvement in the 1977 Koreagate incident and his purported relationships with persons considered to be anti-semitic and anti-democratic. I would like to state that Ed has been cleared on both accounts.

President Reagan had always recognized the importance of our veterans to our country. In November 1988, he reaffirmed his support by signing the bill which elevated the new Department of Veterans' Affairs to Cabinet-level status. My understanding is that President Bush, then President-elect, asked Ed if he would accept the nomination to head this Department. President Bush is well aware of Ed's professional background and experience and obviously has great confidence in his abilities.

I, likewise, am confident that Ed has full appreciation of the importance the Congress and the Nation place on the veterans' programs created to serve those who have served us. By and large, the Veterans' Service Organizations have also expressed confidence in and support of the President's nominee.

I would like to thank the distinguished chairman and the committee members for their thoughtful attention and dedication during the period leading up to the confirmation hearing and during the hearing itself. I was pleased that Members on both sides of the aisle were able to work so closely together on a nomination that will significantly affect our large veteran community and our national defense.

I urge my colleagues to vote unanimously in favor of confirming Ed Derwinski to be Secretary of Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. President, I have had the pleasure of knowing Ed Derwinski for some time. Ed is an unsual individual, and in many ways I think typified by my colleague from Illinois in the sense that he is a real man, he is a real person, he is a friendly person, he can handle situations.

I had the pleasure of being on a trip to Korea not so long ago when Alaska was a nominee for the Winter Olympics. Ed was along as the State Department individual to contribute to the U.S. effort inasmuch as Alaska had been selected as the U.S. site for the competitive matter of selection. We were competing with representatives from Sweden, Norway, Bulgaria, and other countries. Kings, queens, presidents were present. And I recall an occasion where there was a little press conference, and Ed was asked the question, "How do you expect to keep up in the company of kings, queens, presidents, and here you are a representative of the State Department? You have even brought with you a Senator from the State of Alaska. And Ed replied, "Well, ladies and gentlemen, it is a little-known fact that I, Ed Derwinski, and the Senator from Alaska are of Polish nobility," a secret well kept. I thought what an appropriate remark on the spot to handle a rather difficult situation.

And I think that typifies the ability of Ed Derwinski who has come a long, long way in his 32 years of public service.

The Senate Committee on Veteran's Affairs held its hearing yesterday, as the Senator from California indicated. The members expressed their satisfaction, their thanks, for the responses that Ed gave. He gave his personal philosophy. He outlined the leadership skills that he expects to take to the Department of Veterans' Affairs and when he sits at the policy-making level in the Cabinet and addresses the priorities of America's veterans.

You know, Mr. President, we can never repay the obligation that we have to America's veterans. There are those who have said that Ed Derwinski is embarking on a difficult job, and that is right, because we can never do enough. We are going to have to work with what we have to continue to reprioritize the changing needs of America's veterans.

I think the committee is convinced that Ed clearly has demonstrated that he has the qualities he must possess in order to assume the highly responsible position which has been cast upon him.

There are many who are responsible for the creation of the Department of Veterans' Affairs. Certain Members of the House of Representatives, Senator THURMOND, and many of our colleagues were early advocates.

But I think it would be inappropriate to overlook the fact that this occurred on the watch of President Reagan. I happen to be down at the White House that particular day when the President invited several of us down to announce that he had made the decision that he was going to pursue the creation of a Department of Veterans' Affairs. He indicated it was against the advice of some of his closest advisers. Clearly, it was not a subject that was agreed to by everybody and there were comments around that, "Well, if you give the veterans a Cabinet position, you might as well give them the key to the Treasury."

President Reagan felt we owed the veterans of the country an obligation, and this position, on a policymaking level, would bring those involved to that realization.

So I think President Reagan also deserves credit and recognition for his contribution because the Department would not have been established without his commitment.

Ed's distinguished career speaks for itself. I have already indicated that he spent 32 years in public service. He is a World War II veteran, with 24 years in the House of Representatives, and 8 years in the State Department.

He is a man of integrity and principle who willingly cooperated with this committee to ensure that we had the necessary information to fulfill our responsibilities regarding his nomination.

The committee yesterday, as my colleague from California indicated, looked very carefully into the allegations made concerning his involvement in the 1977 so-called Koreagate incident that had been reported in this body at great length during the time of the incident. We also covered his relationship with persons considered to be anti-Semitic and antidemocratic. Ed was completely cleared on both accounts.

I would like to depart for just a moment to indicate in perhaps a modest degree the difficulty which Senator CRANSTON and I and, to a degree, Senator SPECTER and the other Members had in going through the information that was made available to us from classified sources, FBI files, and so forth.

The facts are that when Mr. Derwinski was deposed in 1977, the FBI, in taking the depositions, did not have the availability of taped information, to our knowledge. So the information was taken by an FBI person and then transcribed by that person.

Unfortunately, Mr. Derwinski never saw what he was alleged to have said, and it was paraphrased in the third person, so to speak. As a consequence, when we examined this information, we found there was evidence about the allegation that we could not ask Mr. Derwinski about because he had not seen it since he was deposed.

So I would advise my colleagues and anybody else who is about to be deposed to make very sure that they have a tape recorder with them so that there can be some accurate account of what is said. Senator CRANSTON and I spent many hours trying to make a determination of what the factual information was. Mr. Derwinski was most responsive in indicating from memory his point of view, but we could not communicate to him the information that we had. But I feel quite satisfied, as I am sure my colleague from California is, that we saw all the information that was available to us.

Mr. Derwinski indicated that he had made one mistake back in 1977 and that mistake was thoroughly looked into. We all make mistakes, and if we look at the contribution of Mr. Derwinski since 1977, I think that speaks for itself. Again, I want to assure my colleagues that the matter was looked into as thoroughly as humanly possible.

I wish to thank the staffs on both sides who did a very diligent job of being responsive to the responsibility that the committee chairman and myself as ranking member have. I feel completely satisfied that we have gone through everything that was available and that there is nothing more out there. On this particular issue Ed Derwinski has acknowledged he made a mistake, and I think that is adequate from a standpoint of our obligation.

President Bush has been, of course, well aware of Ed's professional background and experience and obviously has great confidence in Ed's ability to head the new Cabinet-level Department or he would not have nominated him.

I, likewise, am confident that Ed has a full appreciation of the importance the Congress and the Nation place on the veterans' programs created to serve those who have served us. By and large, the veterans' service organizations have also expressed confidence and support of the President's nominee.

Again, I thank the chairman, the senior Senator from California, and the other Members for their diligence during the period leading up to the confirmation. I think both sides worked in a nonpartisan manner and worked closely together. I think that is significant in view of the large veteran community that has been watching this process.

I would conclude by urging my colleagues to vote unanimously in favor of confirming Ed Derwinski to be the first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs for the United States of America.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes Mr. MURKOWSKI.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I will yield briefly to my good friend, the senior member of the Veterans' Committee, Senator THURMOND.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I rise today in strong support of Mr. Edward Derwinski—President Bush's nominee to be the first Secretary of the Department of Veterans' Affairs. This is truly a historic moment. The road to Cabinet status has been a long one, and in just a few weeks the new Department is to be officially in place.

Mr. President, the man chosen to serve as spokesman for our Nation's 27.3 million veterans brings with him numerous qualifications. First and foremost, he is a veteran himself, having served as an Army infantryman in the Pacific theater during World War II. His membership in the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and other service organizations provide him with a good base of understanding of what the needs and concerns of veterans are in the 1980's and 1990's.

Mr. Derwinski's 32 years of public service will serve him well in the position of Cabinet Secretary. After serving 2 years in the Illinois State House of Representatives, he successfully ran for Congress from the South Side of Chicago, representing the district for 24 years. As a Member of the House, he was the ranking Republican of the Foreign Affairs, and Post Office and Civil Service Committees, and was instrumental in passage of landmark Civil Service reform legislation, and foreign aid reform.

After leaving Congress in 1983, he went to the State Department to serve as counselor and as an adviser to former Secretary of State George Shultz. Since March 1987, Mr. Derwinski has served very ably as the Under Secretary of State for Security Assistance, Science and Technology.

Mr. President, in all of these positions, Mr. Derwinski has demonstrated a no-nonsense approach to getting things done. That is the type of person we need at the new Department. Mr. Derwinski has generally enjoyed a warm relationship with Members on both side of the aisle over the years, and I hope that will continue in the years ahead. His career, as a whole, has been one of dedicated public service.

As an aside, I must mention that his lovely wife, Bonita, is also talented in her own right, having served the Reagan administration as Deputy Director of Congressional and Public Affairs at the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

Mr. President, it was my privilege to first introduce the bill to make the Veterans' Administration a Cabinet Department in 1975. As the original sponsor of that legislation last year, I am deeply interested in the new Department and am pleased that Mr. Derwinski has been selected as the first nominee.

Mr. President, I am pleased to offer my strong support for this very able, capable, and dedicated nominee. I urge my colleagues to expeditiously approve his nomination.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I am delighted to rise today to express my unqualified support for Edward J. Derwinski as Secretary of Veterans' Affairs.

I would like all of my distinguished colleagues to know that I do this not just out of courtesy to a fellow Illinois native, but also out of deep respect for Ed Derwinski's lengthy and highly regarded 32 years of public service.

Everyone here knows that Ed is a Republican and I am a Democrat. But what many may not know is that we started our political careers together as freshmen in the Illinois Legislature back in the 1950's, Ed as a Republican, and ALAN DIXON as a Democrat. Down in Springfield, IL, we all grew to respect Ed as a big-hearted, honest, open-minded guy with a sense of humor; in short, a political gentleman who was not afraid to do battle with you by day, and then show his true friendship in the social world. Ed Derwinski was—and is—an honorable political figure in the finest tradition of this country.

In my own service in all three branches of the Illinois State Government, I have observed Ed first hand—from his management of statewide political matters to his personalized handling of casework for veterans. As the senior Senator of Illinois, I can also tell you that his nomination has been well received by all of our veterans organizations in our State.

As a veteran myself, I know Ed is already sending the right signals to all our veterans—that he is their advocate and not just some faceless bureaucrat without access to the corridors of power. He is indeed a personal friend of President Bush, not to mention most Members of this Congress. But Ed Derwinski is more than just a friend; he is a man who gets things done; he is a man who can get people to work together; he is a man who can identify and solve many problems; he is a man who can honorably work and deal with people of all political persuasions. I am sure that every Member of the Senate will enjoy working with Ed Derwinski.

I have, Mr. President, and I recommend him highly and commend him highly to all my friends and colleagues in the U.S. Senate.

I yield back the remainder of my time and thank the chairman and ranking member.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I thank my friend from Alaska for his appreciation of my efforts and I appreciate his efforts. I also want to join in thanking the staff on both sides for their very diligent and hard work on this matter. We did as thorough a job as we could and got into all the facts that could be made available to us, though not all were made available to us.

I am now delighted to yield to the distinguished majority leader who, fortunately, is a member of our committee.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, it is a pleasure to join Chairman ALAN CRANSTON, ranking minority member FRANK MURKOWSKI and the other members of the Veterans' Affairs Committee in bringing the historic nomination of Congressman Edward Derwinski to become the Nation's first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs to the Senate floor today.

The enactment last year of legislation to elevate the Veterans' Administration to a Cabinet-level executive department was one of the significant achievements of the 100th Congress.

Bringing the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs into the President's Cabinent was a long overdue step.

It makes good management sense to have an agency whose programs, operation, and expertise are so widerang-ing and extensive represented at the Cabinet table when domestic policy is formulated.

It is also symbolically important to have the interests and concerns of America's veterans and their families fully represented at the highest levels of this Government when this country's domestic policies are considered and determined.

Public Law 100-527 accords America's veterans a long overdue voice at the highest level of Government. The individual chosen by President Bush to be that voice in his Cabinet is Ed Derwinski.

Ed Derwinski comes before this committee with a long and distinguished career in public service, which began with his service as a combat infantryman in the Pacific Theater during World War II and one term in the Illinois State Legislature.

In 1959, Mr. Derwinski began a long career as a Member of the House of Representatives from the Chicago area that lasted for 24 years, serving on the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee and the Foreign Affairs Committee.

For 6 years, Ed Derwinski has served in the State Department, as counselor and since 1987, as Under Secretary for Security Assistance, Science and Technology.

The first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs faces a big challenge.

First, he must address the present funding crisis, and I believe that is an accurate description of the present circumstances at many VA medical centers, that is diminishing the VA's ability to provide first-class medical care to America's veterans.

Second, he must manage the employees, facilities, and programs of one of the largest departments in the Federal Government, including the largest medical system in the free world.

In taking office and forming a new team to manage the vast resources of the VA, Mr. Derwinski will encounter many issues that are not new, are not prone to quick solution or easily corrected. I can think of a couple very quickly:

Compensation for exposure to agent orange;

Treatment for veterans suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder;

Improving the system of adjudicating veterans benefits claims so that all veterans can be assured their claims will be handled in an efficient, accurate, and fair manner; and

Identifying and implementing solutions to recruit and retain the top-quality medical personnel necessary for the VA to provide the medical care our veterans deserve.

Finally, in all he does, the nominee must meet the very high expectations that exist among the Members of this body, our counterparts in the House and the various veterans service organizations that will be a forceful, determined, and consistent advocate for the interests of veterans, their families and their survivors.

I feel Mr. Derwinski is off to a good start.

On the first count, Mr. Derwinski has indicated in correspondence to the chairman, in his public speaking appearances since being nominated by the President, and in his testimony before the committee that the VA's medical care system needs immediate additional funding and that he supports such supplemental funding for the VA in fiscal year 1989 and intends to press for that funding within the administration.

Acknowledging the existence of a problem, knowing its magnitude, and resolving to correct it are the first steps in solving any problem. But that's more than previous administrators have been willing to do, so I commend Mr. Derwinski for taking this position.

On the second count of balancing his responsibilities as the veterans' advocate and being a team player within the administration, Mr. Derwinski's goal, articulated before the Veterans' Affairs Committee, is to make the veterans case and to have a "pretty good batting average" on behalf of veterans.

That is a fair goal. It goes without saying that there will be many eyes following his performance in meeting that goal. It will not be an easy assignment.

In his testimony to the Veterans' Affairs Committee, the nominee articulated his desire to make the transition from "Administration to Department" as effectively as possible; to consult frequently with representatives of the veterans service organizations; to keep an open door and an open mind; and to work closely with the appropriate committees of Congress.

I can tell the nominee that the members of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, especially the chairman and the ranking minority member, look forward to working with him to find and fashion solutions to the problems he faces in this new position.

We want him to succeed as the first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs. For we share a common goal, to see to it that those benefits earned by veterans through their service to this country are provided them in an efficient, fair, and equitable manner.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I had not intended to speak, but I understand that we are waiting on someone. So I just wanted to take this opportunity to say that I had the pleasure of serving with Ed Derwinski in the House. He is competent. He is very conscientious. He has a great record of service.

We are all hopeful that great things can be done by this new Secretary. I believe that he is the man that could do the job and I am happy to join all the voices here that are raised on his behalf.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I could not be more pleased that a man of Ed Derwinski's caliber and experience will soon be confirmed as our first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs. He brings a wealth of both legislative and executive branch insight to this new and demanding positon that will serve our veterans community.

Make no mistake about it, many demanding challenges face our veterans today. Whether it's health care, shortages of trained medical personnel, or compensation for service-connected disabilities, I'm confident that Ed Derwinski can make the difficult decisions necessary to ensure fairness for those who served their country so selflessly.

America owes its veterans quality representation at the Nation's highest levels. I'm certain that the Senate tonight will recognize that one of our colleagues is ready and able to accept this new challenge and deserves our support.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I rise in support of the nomination of Edward J. Derwinski to be the first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs in the history of our Union. I have great expectations for him, and am extremely hopeful that Ed will set the highest standard for this office.

I am very grateful to the Chairman, ALAN CRANSTON, and ranking member FRANK MURKOWSKI, and to Senators SPECTER and SIMPSON, for their thorough, but fair consideration of the sensitive issues presented by this nomination. My colleagues have established what I believe to be the highest standard for themselves in this process, and Ed knows we will expect the same in return from the new Secretary.

I have reviewed in detail the information provided by the White House and Mr. Derwinski, together with his legislative record as a Member of the House of Representatives. I have found his record to be admirable, albeit what I know to be a single incident of misjudgment with respect to an accidental disclosure of sensitive information. As I have been satisfied that the record is sufficiently complete, I need not discuss that incident further.

I personally met with Mr. Derwinski and frankly discussed the 1977 incident and his perceptions of the mission of the Department of Veterans' Affairs. I found him to be exceedingly candid and very sympathetic to the current veterans health care crisis. True to his word, Ed set about as soon as he could to urge additional funding for health care, and other critical veteran programs. Although he was not initially successful, I believe his actions to date indicate he will not replicate the previous administration's apathy and ambivalence to the declining quality and availability of health care for those who have sacrificed their body and soul to protect our freedom.

Again, I think Ed Derwinski's record as a career public servant is to be commended. He knows of my deep concern that our veterans did not have adequate representation in the past administration. I wish him well and extend to him my pledge to assist him in any manner I can as he accepts what I believe will be one of the greatest challenges of his lifetime.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to extend their support by unanimously approving the nomination of Edward J. Derwinski to the Office of Secretary of Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, today we will vote on the nomination of Mr. Derwinski to head the Department of Veterans' Affairs. In the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee this afternoon, we unanimously voted to recommend the confirmation of Mr. Derwinski.

Last Congress most of us in the Senate voted in favor of the creation of a Department of Veterans' Affairs with a Cabinet-level Secretary heading it. I, too, supported the Department's creation because it represented a chance to bring new focus and new initiatives to the forefront of the agency's thinking. Specifically, I hoped this new Department would be more responsive to the special needs of high growth States like Florida. Florida has the fifth largest population of veterans in the United States and the fastest growing veteran population. It is my hope that the new Secretary will be successful in making the Department more streamlined and well managed. And, if he works in tandem with Congress and the veterans' service organizations, then all veterans stand to benefit. But it is the veterans in States like Florida, where resource allocation has not kept pace with the growth in the population, where veterans stand to gain the most. The more efficient the new Secretary is able to make the Department, the more timely decisionmaking and resource allocation will become.

The issues of resource allocation, health care access and delivery, eligibility for and provision of benefits and services, will only become more complex as the repercussions of the budget shortfall in the medical care account become clearer. The new Secretary will have enormous responsibilities and tough decisions have to be made as we deal with an estimated half billion dollar shortfall. Under these circumstances, Mr. Derwinski's many years in Congress may serve him well. Certainly, his record of service to his congressional constituency should help him develop a positive, responsive relationship with his new constituency, one of the largest and most important constituencies in America—veterans, their dependents and survivors.

I intend to vote for Ed Derwinski. I am satisfied with the committee's thorough and fair confirmation investigation and with Mr. Derwinski's testimony. In my personal conversations with him, Ed Derwinski was forthright and cooperative. The veterans need a strong advocate as head of their new Department. I am counting on Ed Derwinski to be both strong and an advocate.

Mr. DASCHLE. Mr. President, we have before us today a historic vote—the confirmation of the first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs, Edward Derwinski. I am pleased to support the President's nominee to head this long-awaited cabinet post.

Earlier this year I met personally with Mr. Derwinski to discuss the priority issues facing veterans—funding for veterans' health care, compensation for victims exposed to agent orange, and the improved operation of the Department of Veterans' Benefits, among other issues—and I was pleased with his candid approach to discussing his views on these matters.

Furthermore, I was pleased that the nominee agreed with me on the importance of taking prompt action to restore funding for veterans' health care programs. We discussed the fate of the thousands of veterans who have depended on VA health care for years and who are now being denied access to that medical network, and the importance of using the resources available to the Secretary to rectify this tragedy.

The magnitude of that task must not be underestimated. The budget shortfall for veterans' health care for this fiscal year is estimated to be $635 million, with an accumulated shortfall of over $1 billion. With the administration's fiscal year 1990 budget falling an additional $1 billion short of providing adequate veterans' health care, the new Secretary will have his work cut out for him.

This priority issue promises to provide an "initiation by fire" for the new Secretary. Congress, the administration, and the Nation's 27 million veterans will all be watching to learn his assessment of what this Nation's commitment to veterans should be. This is an extremely tough year for someone to endure that scrutiny, but I am encouraged that this nominee will make every effort to meet the serious challenge facing him.

On the day we met to discuss veterans' concerns, just before he left my office, Edward Derwinski left me with one promise—that during his tenure as Secretary of Veterans' Affairs, his door would remain open to discuss crucial veteran concerns. The frank nature of our discussions gives me confidence that whether or not we agree on future specific policies regarding veterans, the first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs will be honest about where he stands, and will keep an open mind in considering how best to address veterans' needs.

The importance of that quality has never been as clear as it is this year. We all know the difficulties faced last year, when the previous Administrator assured Congress that funding for VA health care programs was adequate while veterans were turned away from VA hospitals. I am hopeful that this new era of veterans' programs will be marked by an atmosphere of cooperation and honesty, culminating in genuine dedication to a common goal—providing all veterans with the benefits they have earned through their service to this Nation.

With 1989 holding the greatest challenges ever faced by veterans' programs, the new Cabinet Department and its leader have an opportunity to establish a precedent that this Department operates as an advocate for veterans. Edward Derwinski has told us he will seize that opportunity.

I look forward to working closely with the President's nominee to return to veterans the health care they have earned and deserve. Those who have protected our Nation's freedom should never be expected to accept anything less.

Mr. BURNS. Mr. President, I strongly support President Bush's nominee to be the first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs, Mr. Edward J. Derwinski. Mr. Derwinski's record speaks for itself. He is a veteran himself serving in the U.S. Army during World War II. He knows first hand what it means to have served our country. Some have criticized Mr. Derwinski because he has no experience in Washington with veterans issues. But I can't see that there would be any better qualification for being the Nation's highest representative of veterans than to be one.

After serving in the military, Mr. Derwinski has had a long, prestigious career of serving this country in several capacities—as a representative in the Illinois General Assembly, as a 12-term Member of the House of Representatives, and most recently as a State Department Under Secretary.

I am confident in Mr. Derwinski's ability to handle the problems that face him in his new post. I have already spoken to him about one of those problems which adversely affects Montana's 106,000 veterans—veterans health care. He has assured me that he will do his best to address the funding problems both in fiscal year 1989 and fiscal year 1990. This is a crisis that hurts all veterans, not only those in Montana and I look forward to working with Mr. Derwinski to come up with some solutions—both short-term and long-term.

I won't take up any more time. I know that Mr. Derwinski will win confirmation of the U.S. Senate and will begin his hard work on behalf of this Nation's veterans.

Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. President, since being elected to Congress in 1974, I have had a special interest in the concerns of our country's veterans. This interest was kindled by my own service in the U.S. Navy and Naval Reserves and also by my concern during the 1970's about the veterans who returned from the Vietnam conflict during a very difficult time in our history. In fact, my concern about veterans led me to establish a special advisory committee in Vermont that brought all the different veterans organizations together to discuss issues of common concern and to build a greater degree of unity among the groups.

Given these concerns, I was deeply gratified that my wish to serve on the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee was granted. I believe that our country has unique responsibilities to veterans and I look forward to working to develop positive ways of meeting some of the difficult challenges we face.

My service on the committee begins at a time of great change. Legislation enacted last year will elevate the Veterans' Administration to the Department level beginning on March 15. This act will greatly enhance the profile of veterans programs, spotlighting our country's commitment to those who served in the military.

Into this proverbial lion's den has been thrown my good friend and former House colleague, Ed Derwinski. President Bush's choice to be the first Secretary of the Department of Veterans' Affairs will need to possess outstanding personal qualities. My observations of Ed Derwinski, especially during the committee's consideration of his nomination over the past weeks, have led me to believe that President Bush has made an excellent choice.

Through a long and thorough confirmation procedure, Ed was forthcoming, patient, and good-humored. The committee, under the able direction of Chairman CRANSTON and ranking Republican Senator MURKOWSKI, focused intensively on Ed's involvement in the so-called Korean defector affair. Serious questions arising from this affair were raised, and to my mind, put to rest. In addition, I was heartened by Ed's conduct of himself during this inquiry. He always exhibited a healthy ability to accept criticism and to acknowledge past mistakes.

During yesterday's open hearing before the committee, Ed demonstrated that he has moved quickly to immerse himself in some of the difficult issues he will face following confirmation. I was particularly pleased that Ed already has some creative ideas for meeting some of the challenges that are ahead. All of these qualities will serve Ed well, both in his relations with Congress, and as head of the Government's third largest Department.

I am pleased to support Ed Derwinski's nomination to be Secretary of the Department of Veterans' Affairs and to recommend him favorably to my colleagues.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my colleagues today in voting to confirm Ed Derwinski as the Secretary of Veterans' Affairs.

As many of you know, I served with Ed Derwinski in the U.S. House of Representatives. I have the highest regard for his abilities and am convinced that he is an outstanding choice to be the first Secretary of the new Department charged with administering the programs and concerns of America's veterans.

Ed not only served his Illinois constituents well for 24 years, but also served our Nation as a whole very well during his 8 years at the State Department.

This combined experience in both the legislative and executive branches assures his success as Secretary and assures our veterans will be well served.

I strongly support Ed Derwinski and urge my Senate colleagues to do likewise.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I rise today to express my strong support for the confirmation of Edward J. Derwinski to be the Secretary of Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. Derwinski has a very distinguished record of achievement and service in Congress and at the State Department. He is exceptionally well qualified for this post.

I commend President Bush for making an excellent choice.

Edward Derwinski was born in Chicago, IL, and served as an infantryman in the U.S. Army during World War II. He served in the Pacific Theatre and with the Japanese Occupation Forces in 1945 and 1946.

After completing his military service, he attended Loyola University where he obtained his bachelors degree in history.

Since then, Edward Derwinski has compiled an outstanding record of achievement as a public official. Beginning in 1959, he represented his suburban Chicago district for 24 years as a Member of the U.S. House of Representatives.

In 1982, he accepted an invitation from President Reagan to serve at the State Department. Here he served as Department counselor and adviser to the Secretary, for almost 6 years. Beginning in March 1987 he was the Under Secretary of State for Security Assistance, Science and Technology.

Mr. Derwinski would become our first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs. As the largest independent agency in the Federal Government, with more employees than any Department other than the Department of Defense, President Reagan and the Congress felt that it was time to elevate the VA to Cabinet level.

This is particularly important as more veterans from World War II and Korea reach retirement age. The Federal Government must provide the best service and care possible to our veterans. At the Cabinet level, the Secretary will be in a better position to represent veterans' interests.

Earlier this week, members of the American Legion from New Mexico visited me. They told me that they had listened to an address by Mr. Derwinski the previous evening, and how they were impressed that he would be an effective, caring spokesman for their cause.

Mr. President, I share this enthusiasm, and I urge my colleagues to vote to confirm Edward Derwinski as Secretary of Veterans' Affairs. I believe his integrity, dedication and experience will serve our Nation well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does any other Senator desire to speak to the nomination of Edward Derwinski to be Secretary of Veterans' Affairs?

Do the managers yield back the time?

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania is on his way. He is just a few feet down the hall. I believe the Senator from Wyoming, the minority whip, Senator SIMPSON, has advised us that he wants to say a few words. Those are the only individuals to my knowledge, Mr. President, that have indicated to the minority of their intent to speak on this matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are 11 minutes and 45 seconds on the minority clock remaining.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. In view of the fact, Mr. President, that I do not have anybody here, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, I regret my absence from the floor and the intervening quorum call, but I have been a part of a meeting in the Republican leader's office on the nomination of John Tower, so I could not be present earlier, although I had been here at 6 o'clock until about 6:20 and I could have spoken at that time. But I do have a few comments that I want to make about the nomination of Congressman Derwinski.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair might let the Senator know we are operating under a controlled time agreement. There are 6 minutes 40 seconds remaining on this particular nomination.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I yield 4 minutes to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the floor for 4 minutes.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the distinguished chairman.

Mr. President, I intend to vote for Congressman Derwinski because I believe that on the totality of circumstances—may we have order in the Chamber, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will come to order.

Mr. SPECTER. I intend to vote for Congressman Derwinski because I believe on the totality of circumstances, in the light of his long, distinguished record, he ought to be confirmed.

There is, however, a matter which the Veterans' Affairs Committee investigated in some detail which I believe warrants some additional comment and that is the incident involving the disclosure of the Korean defector. That is a matter of some importance, and it is a complicated matter because it goes back to 1977 and then in 1983 Congressman Derwinski was the subject of a confirmation proceeding. He was confirmed on a voice vote at that time and was further confirmed for another position in 1987.

Notwithstanding that fact, the committee made a detailed inquiry, as far as we could go, on the 1977 incident. I regret, Mr. President, that we were not able to obtain the grand jury notes of the investigation at that time and there are a series of reasons why we were unsuccessful. It may be that we ought to amend the law relating to grand juries' disclosures. We also got limited information from an investigation of the House Ethics Committee at that time; I think it would have been enormously helpful had we had that information as well.

Very detailed efforts were made by the committee to get additional information. It is really unrealistic for the committee to conduct an investigation in 1989 on a 1977 incident. Had we had those contemporaneous investigations we might have known more.

The fact is that on the record at hand, the totality of the evidence, as related by Congressman Derwinski, is that he blurted out the information to a Korean official on the Longworth steps. There is no showing on the record of venality or intention to obstruct justice or intention to injure that so-called defector. Accordingly, I believe that we ought to confirm Congressman Derwinski on this record.

Mr. President, one other comment ought to be made, and that is the difficulty in proceeding and giving Congressman Derwinski a fair hearing in light of the fact that he was not permitted to examine documents which raised certain questions. We wrote to the counsel for the President. I think the record should contain my letter to Boyden Gray, dated February 8, and the letter from Senators CRANSTON and MURKOWSKI, dated February 9, and Mr. Gray's reply, dated February 14, and my reply to that, dated February 16, because we had the curious situation where Congressman Derwinski was not allowed to have any details on matters that he was about to be questioned about. That, also, was unsatisfactory.

But we proceeded as best we could. We had a closed session, and those matters were inquired into diligently and at some length. The totality resulted from having a record where the information was blurted out by Congressman Derwinski and nothing more than that.

We also investigated the allegations of pro-Nazism and anti-Semitic attitudes and conduct, and none of that was found to have any basis.

Mr. President, I think that Congressman Derwinski has a good background to be an effective Secretary of Veterans' Affairs. He is experienced in Government. He is experienced in politics. He expressed himself that he is prepared to be an advocate for the veterans, and I believe on the totality of the record that he ought to be confirmed.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that those letters be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, February 8, 1989.

Hon. C. BOYDEN GRAY,
Counsel to the President, The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR BOYDEN: Following our meeting last Thursday, I met with Congressman Derwinski on Friday afternoon.

In going over the situation with Congressman Derwinski, it seemed to me that you or someone from the Executive Branch should make available to him the specific allegations, so that he would be in a position to respond to concerns which the Veterans' Affairs Committee and I have. As a matter of basic fairness to him, just like it would be a matter of basic fairness to anyone who was asked to respond to any allegation, it is necessary for him to know the specifics and that can only be provided, as I understand it at this stage of the proceeding, by someone from the Executive Branch.

I raised this concern with Senator Cranston who agrees, and I believe that Senator Murkowski also concurs. Senator Murkowski and I have discussed the importance of completing a review of all relevant factual materials at an early date so that the confirmation process can go forward.

I stand ready to put this item at the top of my agenda, as I believe Senator Cranston and Senator Murkowski and others on the Committee will do so, so that the confirmation process can proceed.

I am asking my secretary to call your secretary to read this letter or to telex it to your office forthwith so that you can have it at the earliest possible moment.

Sincerely,

ARLEN SPECTER.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS'S AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, February 9, 1989.

C. BOYDEN GRAY, ESQ.,
Counsel to the President, The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR BOYDEN: The Committee has scheduled a closed, Members-only executive session for 1:30 P.M. on Wednesday, February 22, 1989, regarding the Edward J. Derwinski nomination. The meeting will focus on the report, with accompanying material, of his FBI background investigation.

There are a number of issues arising out of the report and material that we would like to discuss with Mr. Derwinski in the course of that meeting. To be able to do so and in the interest of fairness to him, we specifically request that arrangements be made to give him access, well in advance of that meeting, to his documented interviews in the FBI reports and to those classified materials relating to the 1977 unauthorized disclosure of the planned defection of a South Korean CIA agent.

We also believe that it is essential that our Committee have access to the notes, minutes, and any reports or other materials, as they relate to Mr. Derwinski, arising out of a Federal Grand Jury investigation in the Fall of 1977 into the incident of unauthorized disclosure mentioned above. In that regard, we ask that the Department of Justice be directed to initiate a judicial proceeding in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia to seek access to that information so that it can be reviewed by this Committee. We further ask that Mr. Derwinski's agreement be sought and, if obtained, communicated to the District Court. The Office of Senate Legal Counsel is prepared to provide assistance to the Department in such a proceeding.

We thank you for your cooperation and for your timely efforts in these matters.

Sincerely,

ALAN CRANSTON,
Chairman.
FRANK H. MURKOWSKI,
Ranking Minority Member.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, DC, February 14, 1989.

Hon. ARLEN SPECTER,
Committee on Veterans' Affairs, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR SPECTER: This letter responds to your letter to me of February 8, 1989 requesting that the Executive branch provide Mr. Derwinski with access to various materials (including classified documents) that relate to the so-called Koreagate affair.

As I note in my response to a letter similar to yours that I received from the Chairman and Ranking Minority Member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, we defer to the judgment of the Members of the Committee as to the information raised in the FBI background investigation that they feel must be discussed with Mr. Derwinski. We note, however, that since many of these materials relate to a previous criminal investigation the White House did not believe it was appropriate to provide Mr. Derwinski with access to the various materials compiled by the FBI, which include certain classified documents, before his nomination was submitted to the Senate; we continue to believe that it is inappropriate for us to share those materials with him. (Of course, we express no opinion as to whether the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct or the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations should provide to Mr. Derwinski materials they may have generated in connection with their investigation of his role in Koreagate.)

The allegations involving Congressman Derwinski's role in Koreagate were the subject of a 1977 grand jury investigation, a 1978 House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct investigation and the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations confirmation hearing on Mr. Derwinski in 1983. We express no view as to the propriety of reopening an investigation of Congressman Derwinski's role in Koreagate at this time, except to say that responding to such an investigation is beyond the scope of the duties of the Office of the White House Counsel.

For your information, we have accordingly forwarded to the Department of Justice the Chairman and Ranking Member's request that the Department of Justice initiate a lawsuit on behalf of the Committee to obtain access to the referenced grand jury materials. With respect to this and other requests that in essence seek to reopen Koreagate, we request that the Committee deal directly with the Department of Justice or with the two relevant congressional committees that were previously involved.

Of course, the White House Counsel's office remains available to consider the Committee's requests for additional FBI investigation on matters that have arisen since Mr. Derwinski was last confirmed by the Senate in 1987 or matters that have not been addressed previously. In this connection, the FBI will complete its investigation of the allegations concerning Nazism in the very near future and we will make that report available to you at your convenience.

Sincerely,

C. BOYDEN GRAY,
Counsel to the President.

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON VETERANS' AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, February 16, 1989.

Hon. C. BOYDEN GRAY,
Counsel to the President, The White House, Washington, DC

DEAR BOYDEN: Thank you for your letter of February 14, responding to mine of February 8, 1989.

While I appreciate your deference to the "judgment of the Members of the Committee as to the information raised in the FBI background investigation which they feel must be discussed with Mr. Derwinski,"that does not adequately respond to the considerations raised in my letter of February 8 or the issues raised by Senator Cranston and Senator Murkowski in their letter to you dated February 9, 1989.

In my judgment, there are papers in the FBI file which Congressman, Derwinski, should see in advance of questioning by members of the Veterans' Affairs Committee so that:

1. He can have an opportunity to prepare for the hearing as a matter of basic fairness to him; and

2. The Committee members can pursue questioning of those subjects with Congressman Derwinski in a sensible fashion.

In view of the shortness of time and the slowness of the mail, I am asking my secretary to call your secretary to read this letter and to telex it to your office forthwith so you can have it at the earliest possible moment.

Sincerely,

ARLEN SPECTER.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the Chair, and I thank my colleagues for yielding the time, and I yield the floor.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I am so very pleased to rise today in support of the nomination of Edward J. Derwinski to be the first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs.

Ed Derwinski is a highly respected former Member of Congress, having served in the House of Representatives for 24 years. He has most recently served at the State Department for 6 years.

I have met several times with Ed Derwinski and am extremely impressed by his commitment to serving the veterans of this Nation responsibly. His personal and professional qualifications for the position are clear. Having served very ably for many years in the House of Representatives and for a number of years in the executive branch, he has a clear understanding of the legislative process. He is so well respected by his colleagues.

The Committee on Veterans' Affairs met yesterday in public hearing to discuss the qualifications of this nominee, to ask him questions concerning his commitment to veterans, and to see that they are afforded the best care available, and to air in public—once again—allegations that had been raised in a number of editorials and news reports concerning Mr. Derwinski's suitability to be Secretary of Veterans' Affairs. The alleged unsuitability was premised on two grounds—the first that Ed Derwinski was somehow anti-Semitic because of his campaign work with a Republican campaign council that works to garner support among ethnic minorities; the second that Ed Derwinski had breached a confidence during his service in the House of Representatives in 1977.

The first of these allegations is nothing more than a feeble, ignorant, and baseless "guilt by association." To hold Ed Derwinski responsible for the views or backgrounds of every other person who might also have worked on those campaigns would be like holding the national commander of the American Legion or the VFW or Amvets responsible for my views, since I belong to all of those fine organizations. I am sure those gentlemen might take issue at having my opinions—at least on some matters—attributed to them.

The second allegation is one that had been previously raised when Mr. Derwinski was confirmed as State Department counselor by the Senate in 1983. The allegations were discussed by members of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs in a closed meeting and again in open session the following day. Many members of the committee, including our own fine chairman, did not attend that session, but it was a scheduled and open hearing. Mr. Derwinski admitted at the time that hindsight showed his inadvertent reference to a possible defection to be a mistake—a "stupid one" and one that he greatly regretted.

In preparing for the hearing, I reviewed that transcript, interviewed Mr. Derwinski thoroughly myself, read the FBI report, and reviewed other documents, reports, and interviews made available to members in a closed session Wednesday. Other members of the committee prepared themselves similarly. Nothing that I reviewed has given me any reason to doubt the suitability or ability of Ed Derwinski to serve capably, honorably, and with great distinction as the first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs.

In his many years of public service, only one incident in public life occurred that Ed Derwinski has said he regrets and regards as a mistake. I am completely satisfied that there was no evil intent behind the incident—it was simply an inadvertent mistake. Now, after 12 years and 2 other Senate hearings to confirm Ed Derwinski for administration posts, it has only arisen again to plague him unnecessarily.

Throughout the past several months since he was nominated, as throughout his career, Ed Derwinski has behaved with integrity and honor, and I am honored to be able to support him for this position.

He's going to do a great job—with ultimate fairness. He and his spirited and bright wife, Bonnie, make a nice addition to the Cabinet corps.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I yield 3 minutes to the distinguished Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise, of course, in support of the nomination, the historic moment when we create a Veterans' Affairs Department and have a Secretary thereof. I would wish simply to record a long and affectionate relationship with Representative Derwinski. He and I were members of the U.S. Delegation to the United Nations General Assembly in the autumn and winter of 1971, where I had repeated opportunities to work with him in matters of great sensitivity to the country and of importance to the world.

I found him without ever the slighest lapse to be a man of transparent probity and shining patriotism. It is important to me that a man of peace, as he has been his whole life in public affairs, should now engage himself with the concerns of Americans who have had to go to war. He will do so with a double understanding of the responsibility and I wish him, as we all do, the greatest possible success.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The chair recognizes the Senator from California.

Mr. CRANSTON. I yield 3 minutes to the Senator from Hawaii, a member of our committee; 3 minutes to Senator MATSUNAGA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senator MATSUNAGA has the floor for 3 minutes.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I rise in strong support of the nomination of Edward J. Derwinski to be the first Secretary of Veterans' Affairs. Mr. Derwinski is highly qualified to act as the prime advocate of the Nation's 27 million veterans and their 51 million family members. First and most important, Mr. Derwinski is a veteran himself, having served as an enlisted man in World War II in the Pacific Theater. His service in the enlisted ranks gives him a perspective many do not possess: he understands the feelings of those who are not at the top of the chain of command, who are forever at the mercy of superiors or of bureacracy, and who therefore must be the special concern of those in power.

Second, Mr. Derwinski's 24 years in the House, representing a highly diverse, ethnic constituency in Chicago, has given him an appreciation of the congressional process, both its strengths and weaknesses. I served many of those years as a colleague of his. I remember him as an effective, respected, and well-liked legislator, a formidable combination in any setting. He, perhaps more than any of President Bush's Cabinet Secretaries, understands the general political dynamics that drive the institution as well as the special concerns of individual members.

Finally, Mr. Derwinski has an intimate knowledge of the executive branch of government, having served as counselor and Under Secretary of State for Security Affairs in the State Department, two important and difficult jobs. From all indications, he brought the same skills of accommodation and reasonableness he developed in the House to Foggy Bottom, skills that have not always been in abundance there. Unfortunately, I must add, he also brought plaid sports jackets. Aside from this failing, he was a highly effective executor of the Administration's policies.

Mr. President, Mr. Derwinski is an outstanding candidate for Secretary of Veterans' Affairs. His wide experience in life and in government mark him as a man who can successfully lead the Department through its most serious fiscal crisis. I am confident that he will be a great advocate for veterans. I urge my colleagues to confirm the nomination of my good friend Ed Derwinski.

I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, we yield back our remaining time.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, this side likewise yields back all remaining time.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I ask for the yeas and nays.

STRATOSPHERIC OZONE AND CLIMATE PROTECTION ACT

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, with each passing day we have seen more attention being paid to global environmental problems. We are used to attention being paid to national difficulties, but now the global worries are more before us every day.

I think, Mr. President, that if 10 years ago we had stopped a group of people in the street and asked them what they thought about the greenhouse effect or the destruction of the ozone layer, the chances are that the group would have responded with a blank stare.

Now today these issues are high on everyone's worry list. To my mind, that is good news. Before we can solve these problems we have to have widespread recognition of the fact that these global and environmental threats are real and that they are serious. That widespread recognition is now present.

The attention these matters are getting is reflected in the press and in public statements by world leaders such as President Bush, Secretary General Gorbachev of the Soviet Union, and Prime Ministers Thatcher of the United Kingdom, Brundtland of Norway, and Mulroney of Canada. The widespread recognition we need is now here.

Today, on behalf of myself and the chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Environmental Protection, Senator BAUCUS, I am introducing the Stratospheric Ozone and Climate Protection Act of 1989. This is a revised, updated version of the bill I introduced 2 years ago in February 1987, S. 571. We will be holding hearings in the Committee on Environment and Public Works and plan to move this bill as quickly as possible.

Mr. President, the main impetus for this legislation is the ongoing destruction of the ozone layer. Chlorofluorocarbons and other manmade chemicals are reacting with and destroying ozone in the stratosphere. As a result we—"we"—meaning the world—are losing the shield that protects us from the Sun's harmful ultraviolet radiation.

What does this all mean? With more radiation pouring through the atmosphere there definitely will be an increased incidence of cancer, skin cancer, and cataracts. Furthermore experts have testified that increased radiation may cause suppression of the body's immune system and make us more susceptible to all sorts of diseases.

Studies on the effects of solar ultraviolet radiation have shown that damage to the stratospheric ozone layer presents a serious threat to our food crops and to all forms of life on land and in the sea.

Equally important is the fact that these chemicals—what we are talking about now is these ozone depleting chemicals, the chlorofluorocarbons, sometimes referred to as CFC's, which are powerful greenhouse gases, the balance of the change coming from the release of carbon dioxides from the burning of fossil fuels, and there are other contributors, as well—in addition to being ozone depleters, are powerful greenhouse gases. They act as a thermal blanket, trapping heat in the Earth's atmosphere and causing temperatures to rise. It is estimated that they contribute around 20 percent to the problem of global climate change. They have to be recaptured, recycled, and safely disposed of and not released.

Finally, the legislation includes trade sanctions that can be used to leverage other countries and convince their governments to adopt phaseout programs similar to ours. The trade provisions are designed to assure that U.S. industries will not be penalized by domestic unilateral action to eliminate CFC's.

In other words, why should we suffer competitively because we have done the right thing for the rest of the world, and our competitors might not. For instance, CFC's are used to clean chips that are used in electornic devices. If a foreign country refuses to, and continues to use CFC's to clean their chips, whereas, we banned it, then we will ban the importation of those chips, and it is possible to trace the fact that imported chips have used CFC's as a cleanser and a solvent. Elimination of these chemicals is the most effective, single step we can take to curb the phenomenon known as the greenhouse effect.

By eliminating these harmful chemicals, we will be addressing two problems at once: Destruction of the ozone layer and the threat of uncontrolled global climate change.

This bill has five main elements:

First, it puts the five worst chlorofluorocarbons [CFC's]—numbers 11, 12, 113, 114, and 115—on a phaseout schedule that moves faster and further than the Montreal Protocol; instead of the protocol's 20-percent reduction in 1993 and 50-percent reduction in 1998, my bill calls for a 20-percent reduction in 1992, a 50-percent reduction in 1995, and complete elimination no later than 1997;

Second, where the protocol will only freeze production of the halons and does not regulate methyl chloroform at all, two powerful ozone depleters, my bill puts these chemicals on the same phaseout schedule as the most harmful CFC's;

Third, whereas the Montreal Protocol would allow unlimited growth in the production and use of other, less potent ozone depleting chemicals and, in turn, continue the threat to the ozone layer, my bill places a limit on the growth of such chemicals by requiring that total ozone depletion potential be reduced by 95 percent between now and 1997; the key here is to control the chlorine loading of the atmosphere from all manufactured chemicals;

Fourth, the bill includes a supplement to the production phaseout; recognizing that it would be extremely difficult to eliminate all production and use of these chemicals on a 2- to 3-year timeframe we must, at the very least, eliminate emissions that are destroying the ozone layer; to achieve this, the bill prohibits, as of January 1, 1993, the venting or release of these chemicals into the environment; recapture, recycling, and safe disposal will be required; and Fifth, 12 months after this bill becomes law, importation of ozone depleting chemicals, and products made with or containing such chemicals, will be prohibited unless EPA certifies that the country of origin is on a phaseout schedule similar to ours.

Prospects for the bill depend on the willingness of other nations to amend the Montreal Protocol and the speed with which the international process moves forward. It is preferable to address the problem through international agreement. No one can argue with that.

My bill includes a phaseout schedule for CFC's and other ozone depleting chemicals that moves faster and further than the Montreal Protocol, which was signed last year, the international agreement that went into effect January 1 this year. Instead of the protocol, the Montreal agreement provided for 20 percent reduction of CFC's in 1993 and 50 percent reduction in 1998. My bill calls for a 20-percent reduction, not in 1993, but in 1992; a 50-percent reduction, not in 1998, but 1995. Furthermore, I have a complete elimination no later than 1997, which is only 8 years from now.

My bill places a limit on the production and use of chemicals that are completely unregulated under the Montreal protocol and requires that total ozone depletion potential be reduced by 95 percent between now and 1997. As a supplement to production controls, the bill seeks to eliminate emissions that are destroying the ozone layer. By 1993, in January, the venting or releasing of these chemicals, and I am not talking now production, I am talking of the release of these CFC's that are in a refrigerator that one might dispose of, or an automobile air conditioner that one might dispose of, no longer can an individual just vent these, let them go up in the stratosphere. They will have to be recaptured, and that is perfectly possible now with the equipment we currently have.

Both President Bush and EPA Administrator Reilly are deeply interested in the CFC problem and I urge them to endorse my proposal. The United States should take a leading role in pressing for elimination of these chemicals by no later than 1997. Informal negotiations will begin this Sunday in London at a meeting called by Prime Minister Thatcher. Formal talks will get under way with the first meeting of the parties to the Montreal protocol that will be held in Helsinki during the latter half of April.

Nevertheless, if the negotiations bog down, we will not sit around and wait. As a major consumer of CFC's we can use our clout as a trading partner. If we are forced to move first, it will have a secondary beneficial effect: Our industry can get the jump on alternatives and be more competitive in the future.

My proposal to eliminate the most harmful CFC's, halons and methyl chloroform, by 1997 may strike some as a tough pill to swallow. I recognize the enforcement difficulties, such as identifying and prosecuting those who release CFC's into the atmosphere or ascertaining whether foreign electronics manfacturers have used CFC solvents. But these problems can be overcome.

True, this bill is strong medicine but I worry that it is not strong enough. We have a very sick patient, a patient who is suffering from a disease that continues to advance like a cancer. With each new study, the scientists discover a new surprise. They are finding that the disease is much more advanced than anyone thought.

It seems that every time we get a piece of good news about the ozone layer, it is followed by a matter of weeks with more bad news.

For example, on September 26, 1987, 24 nations signed the Montreal protocol on substances that deplete the ozone layer. That was a major achievement and gave us reason to cheer. But within 2 weeks we had a new report from Antarctica confirming our worst fears, the "hole" over the Antarctic was worse than we thought and manmade chemicals such as CFC's were identified as "the smoking gun."

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In March 1988, the Senate voted to approve ratification of the protocol, another step forward. This time, the bad news came the very next day. The results of an international study on global ozone trends was released by the Ozone Trends Panel, a distinguished group of more than 100 government and academic scientists from around the world. They delivered a startling, sobering and frightening message. The Washington Post headline read: "Evidence of Ozone Depletion Found Over Big Urban Areas: Pattern Widens; Severity Surprises Experts."

By analyzing data collected since 1969, these scientists found that over an area from 40 degrees north—a line running roughly from Philadelphia through Columbus, OH, and Reno—to 53 degrees north—a line running through central Canada—we are destroying ozone at a rate of 2 percent each summer and 5 percent each winter. This area includes most of Europe and China.

From 53 degrees north to 64 degrees north—an area covering most of Alaska, northern Canada, and the Soviet Union—we are seeing ozone losses exceeding 6 percent in the wintertime. These numbers are staggering. It is important to note that these measurements are far greater than the depletion that was being predicted by computer models.

In the Southern Hemisphere, the panel reported a year-round depletion of 5 percent or more at all latitudes south of 60 degrees south. This means that the "seasonal hole" over Antarctica is no longer seasonal and that it is getting dangerously close to inhabitated portions of South America, Australia, and New Zealand.

Prior to this, many scientists and industry representatives were telling us that the famous "Hole" over Antarctica was an interesting, isolated phenomenon limited to that remote part of the globe. They told us there was no proof that CFC's destroy ozone on a global scale. They told us that warnings from Drs. Rowland and Molina—warnings first issued in the early 1970's about CFCs destroying ozone—were just speculation, they were just theories.

There is no longer any question, Mr. President, we have moved beyond speculation and theory. As Dr. Watson, the NASA scientist who chaired the international panel said: "Things are worse than we thought. There has been a long-term change since 1969 that had not been recognized before."

Dr. John Gille, a scientist with the National Center for Atmospheric Research and one of the leaders of the panel that prepared the report said that, if earlier data had given scientists "a smoking gun," this report had given them "the corpse." He noted that: "For the first time, we have a really definitive answer that ozone has decreased." He said "we understand what is going on and we can predict it will be much more severe in the future."

Following this report, the two major producers of CFC's in this country, du Pont and Allied Signal, stated their intention to phase out production of these chemicals and, in September 1988, then-Administrator of the EPA, Lee Thomas, called for a complete phaseout of ozone depleting CFC's and halons. Several weeks ago, du Pont announced a major breakthrough in the search for safe alternatives. We were back at a high point on the roller coaster, good news abounds.

In keeping with the now well-established pattern, we were due for a new scientific report showing that the problem is worse than we thought. On Friday, February 17, 1989, NASA and NOAA issued a preliminary report from the recent airborne expedition to the Arctic region. As many of us expected, the news was grim.

In scientific jargon, the polar expedition found that the chemical makeup of the atmosphere over the Arctic was extremely perturbed.

This means the scientists have found that the Arctic region is primed for chemical reactions similar to those that are destroying ozone over Antarctica. As in the past, the scientists were surprised. One of the expedition's leaders, NASA's Dr. Watson said that "the incredible perturbation" found in the chemistry of the stratosphere "is a strong message to policymakers."

The message is that nothing less than total elimination of these harmful chemicals will suffice. We need a crash program to find and use safe substitutes as quickly as possible. We have a crisis on our hands and business as usual will not be tolerated.

To those who say it can't be done, I say "it must be done." The time for rhetoric and vague promises is past. The time for action is now.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a section-by-section analysis of the bill and the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS OF THE STRATOSPHERIC OZONE AND CLIMATE PROTECTION ACT OF 1989

Section 1. Short Title.

Section 2. Congressional Findings.—Includes findings that manufactured substances, such as chlorofluorocarbons, are polluting the atmosphere and may be contributing to the related environmental problems of stratospheric ozone depletion and global climate change due to the greenhouse effect; these related problems threaten human health and the environment on a global scale; it is necessary to control international trade in chlorofluorocarbons and other ozone depleting substances to protect our global environment; and the United States needs to be the world leader in developing substitutes for these harmful chemicals.

Section 3. Objectives and National Goal.—Establishes as a national goal, the elimination of atmospheric pollution caused by the release of manufactured chemicals, such as chlorofluorocarbons.

Section 4. Definitions.—Includes definitions of "household appliances" and "medical purposes" that receive special consideration under Section 9; "manufactured substances"; and "substances covered by this Act".

Section 5. Listing of Regulated Substances.—There are two lists of regulated substances:—(1) a priority list of chemicals that must be eliminated by the year 1997 (production of certain CFCs, halons and methyl chloroform is to be frozen at 1986 levels in 1989, reduced by 20 percent in 1992, reduced by 50 percent in 1995, and eliminated in 1997 and (2) a list of other chemicals with ozone depletion potential. The priority list includes the most popular and harmful chlorofluorocarbons (11, 12, 113, 114 and 115), halons (1211, 1301 and 2402), and methyl chloroform. The second list includes chemicals such as methylene chloride, carbon tetrachloride, and chlorofluorocarbons-22, 123, 124, 125, 141(b) and 142(b).

The production of chemicals on the second list is regulated and limited on the basis of overall ozone depletion potential. Since the regulated chemicals have differing, relative ozone depletion potential, producers are free to shift their production capacity from a priority list substance to a second list substance or from one second list substance to another, provided the total ozone depletion potential of chemicals manufactured by each producer is reduced significantly over the next several years (based on 1986 levels, ODP must be reduced by 95 percent no later than 1997).

Section 6. Reporting.—Producers of ozone depleting chemicals are required to submit annual reports to the EPA.

Section 7. Production Phase-Out for Priority List.—This section sets forth the phase-out mentioned earlier.

Section 8. National Security Exemption.—This section authorizes the President to modify the controls of halons on the basis of national security needs.

Section 9. Limitation on Use and Disposal.—In addition to the production limitations set forth in the bill, the Administrator is directed to promulgate, by July 1, 1991, regulations that will reduce the use of chemicals that are destroying the ozone layer and increase the recapture and recycling of such chemicals. By 1994, specific regulations are to be in place regarding the recapture, recycling and safe disposal of the regulated chemicals.

To further supplement the production limitations of the bill, as of January 1, 1993, it shall be unlawful for any person to intentionally vent or release into the atmosphere any of the regulated chemicals (other than the halons that are used in fire extinguishers). This provision is premised on the theory that, if we cannot eliminate production of these harmful chemicals by 1993, we must at least eliminate emissions that are destroying the ozone layer and contributing to the greenhouse effect.

Recognizing that (1) there are some essential medical uses for these chemicals for which no safe alternative is likely to be developed, and (2) many people have recently purchased (or are planning to purchase) household appliances that depend on the continued availability of these chemicals, the prohibition on use of chemicals slated for elimination in the year 1997 does not apply to uses for medical purposes and, for a period not to exceed the year 2007, to service and maintain household appliances.

Section 10. Limitation on Ozone Depletion Potential.—This section sets forth the reduction in overall production of ozone depleting substances mentioned earlier.

Section 11. Accelerated Schedule.—Based on new information regarding the severity of the problem or on the availability of safe substitutes, the Administrator is authorized to accelerate the phase out schedule set forth in the bill.

Section 12. Certification of Equivalent Programs.—Chemicals with ozone depleting potential pose a threat to human health and the environment without regard to where such chemicals or products that use such chemicals are made. Protection of the environment necessitates the regulation of international trade and the imposition of import controls that track the domestic controls set forth in this Act. Therefore, unless a country of origin is certified as having a phase-out program similar to this Act, the regulated chemicals (or products) from such country cannot be imported into this country. Similarly, this Act will prohibit the use of the U.S. as a free port for transshipment of such chemicals (or products).

Section 13. Labeling.—All containers of, or products made with, substances covered by this Act must bear a warning label.

Sections 14-19.—Miscellaneous Provisions on Federal Enforcement, Judicial Review, Citizen Suits, Separability, Relationship to Other Laws, and Authority of Administrator.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Stratospheric Ozone and Climate Protection Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) the best available scientific evidence shows that manufactured substances, including chlorofluorcarbons and other substances covered by this Act, are destroying statospheric ozone, and significantly contributing to global climate change, and other atmospheric modifications;

(2) no level of stratospheric ozone depletion or global climate change caused by human activities can be deemed safe;

(3) stratospheric ozone depletion will lead to increased incidence of solar ultraviolet radiation in the troposphere and at the surface of the Earth;

(4) increased incidence of solar ultraviolet radiation will cause increased rates of disease in humans (including increased rates of skin cancer, cataracts, and, potentially, suppression of the immune system), threaten food crops and marine resources, and otherwise damage the natural environment;

(5) the Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer provides a framework for all nations of the world to protect the earth's ozone shield;

(6) the Ozone Trends Report completed in March 1988 through the effort of over 100 international scientists found undisputed observational evidence that the atmospheric concentrations of source gases important in controlling stratospheric ozone levels (chlorofluorocarbons, halons, methane, nitrous oxide, and carbon dioxide) are increasing on a global scale as a result of human activities and that observed losses of ozone since 1970 are significantly greater than computer models had predicted, especially over the northern hemisphere during the winter months where losses ranging from 2.3% to 6.2% were observed;

(7) the computer models used in the formulation of the Montreal Protocol predicted that global ozone depletion would reach 0.8% by 1986, the Ozone Trends Report measured global ozone depletion of 2.5%;

(8) there has been a large, sudden, and unexpected decrease in spring-time Antarctic ozone with decreases greater than 50% in the total column, and greater than 95% between an altitude of 15 to 20 kilometers;

(9) scientific expeditions and analyses have established that chlorine compounds derived from emissions of chlorofluorocarbons are responsible for destruction of the stratospheric ozone layer over the Antarctic and the surrounding oceans;

(10) recent scientific reports indicate that a similar destruction of the ozone layer may occur over the Arctic region and that the same chlorine compounds found in the Antarctic region are present in areas of the Arctic ozone layer;

(11) experimental laboratory studies and measurements of ozone depletion suggest that the chemical reactions responsible for destruction of ozone over Antarctic could operate in the aerosal layer of the stratosphere and would not be limited to the polar regions;

(12) the Ozone Trends Report found that, since 1979, ozone appears to have decreased by 5% or more at all latitudes south of 60 degrees south throughout the entire year;

(13) the control measures that are set forth in the Montreal Protocol (a freeze on the consumption of certain chlorofluorocarbons at 1986 levels in 1989 followed by a 20% reduction in 1993 and on additional 30% reduction in 1998, coupled with a freeze on the consumption of certain halons at 1986 levels in 1992) will allow atmospheric concentrations of chlorine to increase by more than a factor of two;

(14) the Ozone Trends Report and other recent scientific studies have raised serious questions about the adequacy of the control measures that are set forth in the Montreal Protocol;

(15) ozone depleting chlorofluorocarbons are powerful greenhouse gases projected to be responsible for 15-25% of global warming and, under the existing Montreal Protocol, 10% of future warming;

(16) stratospheric ozone depletion and global climate change from continued emissions of chlorofluorocarbons and other halogenated chlorocarbons with ozone depleting potential, and emissions of other gases, imperil human health and the environment worldwide;

(17) in order to stabilize and eventually reduce concentrations of chlorine and bromine in the stratosphere, to conserve the stratospheric ozone layer (an exhaustible natural resource), and to reduce the extent of global climate change—

(A) emissions of chlorofluorocarbons and other substances covered by this Act, including halogenated carbons with ozone depleting potential, should be terminated rapidly,

(B) it is necessary to control international trade in substances covered by this Act and products containing or made with processes that use such substances; and

(C) trade with countries that are not parties to the Montreal Protocol should be controlled;

(18) the highest priority must be given to developing and deploying safe and energy efficient substitutes to replace ozone depleting substances as rapidly as possible; and

(19) the United States needs to develop and deploy safe, energy efficient substitutes to replace ozone depleting substances in order to demonstrate to the world its commitment to protect the stratosphere and to limit climate change.

SEC. 3. OBJECTIVES AND NATIONAL GOAL.

(a) The objectives of this Act are to restore and maintain the chemical and physical integrity of the Earth's atmosphere and to protect human health and the global environment from all known and potential dangers due to atmospheric or climatic modification, including stratospheric ozone depletion, that is or may be related to the chlorofluorocarbons or other substances covered by this Act by—

(1) reducing significantly the production and emission into the atmosphere of pollutants caused by human activities,

(2) promoting the rapid development and deployment of energy efficient alternatives to the use of chlorofluorocarbons and other substances covered by this Act,

(3) assuring that such alternatives reduce ozone depleting potential to the maximum extent possible and, at the same time, do not exacerbate the problem of human induced global climate change either directly as radiatively important trace gases or indirectly as substances that reduce the energy efficiency of products which incorporate or use such substances, and

(4) promoting additional scientific research on atmospheric or climatic modification, including stratospheric ozone depletion, and the known and potential adverse effects therefrom on human health and the global environment.

(b) In order to achieve the objectives of this Act, it is the national goal to eliminate atmospheric emissions of manufactured substances with ozone depleting potential as well as direct and indirect global warming potential, including chlorofluorocarbons and other halogenated carbons with ozone depleting and global warming potential, and to reduce to the maximum extent possible emissions of other gases caused by human activities that are likely to affect adversely the global climate.

SEC. 4. DEFINITIONS.

(2) The term "household appliances" means noncommercial personal effects, including air-conditioners, refrigerators, and motor vehicles.

(3) The term "import" means to land on, bing into, or introduce into, or attempt to land on, bring into, or introduce into, any place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, whether or not such landing, bringing, or introduction constitutes an importation within the meaning of the customs laws of the United States.

(4) The term "manufactured substances" means any organic or inorganic chemical substances of a particular molecular identity, or any mixture, that has been manufactured for commercial purposes.

(5) The term "medical purposes" means medical devices and diagnostic products (A) for which no safe substitute has been developed and (B) which, after notice and opportunity for public comment, has been approved and determined to be essential by the Commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, in consultation with the Administrator.

(6) The term "person" means an individual, corporation (including a government corporation), partnership, firm, joint stock company, trust, association, or any other entity, or any officer, employee, agent, department, or instrumentality of the Federal Government, of any State or political subdivision thereof (including any interstate body), or of any foreign government (including any international instrumentality).

(7) The term "substances covered by this Act" means those substances which are known or may reasonably be anticipated to cause or contribute to atmospheric or climatic modification, including stratospheric ozone depletion, and are listed under subsections (a) or (b) of section 5.

SEC. 5. LISTING OF REGULATED SUBSTANCES.

(a) PRIORITY LIST AND INITIAL LISTS OF SUBSTANCES TO BE PHASED-OUT.—Within sixty days after enactment of this Act, the Administrator shall publish a priority list of manufactured substances which are known or may reasonably be anticipated to cause or contribute to atmospheric or climatic modification, including stratospheric ozone depletion. The initial list shall include chlorofluorocarbon-11, chlorofluorocarbon-12, chlorofluorocarbon-113, chlorofluorocarbon-114, chlorofluorocarbon-115, methyl chloroform, halon-1211, halon-1301, and halon-2402.

(b) OTHER REGULATED SUBSTANCES.—Simultaneously with publication of the priority list, the Administrator shall create a list of other manufactured substances which, in the judgment of the Administrator, meet the criteria set forth in the first sentence of subsection (a). The list of other substances shall be subject to the limitations on ozone depletion potential under section 10 of this Act and shall include chlorofluorocarbon-22, chlorofluorocarbon-123, chlorofluorocarbon-124, chlorofluorocarbon-125, chlorofluorocarbon-141(b), chlorofluorocarbon-142(b), carbon tetrachloride, and methylene chloride. At least annually thereafter, the Administrator shall publish a proposal to add to such list each other manufactured substance which, in the judgment of the Administrator, meets the criteria set forth in the first sentence of subsection (a). Within one hundred and eighty days of any such proposal, after allowing an opportunity for public comment, the Administrator shall promulgate a regulation adding each such substance to the list, unless the Administrator determines that such substance clearly does not meet the criteria set forth in the first sentence of subsection (a).

(c) OZONE DEPLETION FACTOR.—Simultaneously with publication of the lists or additions thereto under this section, and at least annually thereafter, the Administrator shall assign to each listed substance a numerical value representing the ozone depletion potential of such substance, on a mass (per kilogram) basis, as compared with chlorofluorocarbon-11. The numerical value shall, for the purposes of section 10, constitute the ozone depletion factor of each such substance. Unless the Administrator promulgates regulations under this subsection setting forth a different value, the following ozone depletion factors shall apply for each listed substance:

Substance	Ozone depleting factor
Chlorofluorocarbon-11	1.0
Chlorofluorocarbon-12	1.0
Chlorofluorocarbon-22	0.05
Chlorofluorocarbon-113	0.8

Chlorofluorocarbon-142(b)	0.06
Carbon tetrachloride	1.06
Methyl chloroform	0.10
Halon-1211	3.0

SEC. 6. REPORTING REQUIREMENTS.

(a) PRIORITY LIST.—Within ninety days after enactment of this Act, each person producing a substance listed pursuant to subsection (a) of section 5 shall file a report with the Administrator setting forth the amount of the substance that was produced by such person during calendar year 1986. Not less than annually thereafter, each producer shall file a report with the Administrator setting forth the production levels of such substance in each successive twelve-month period until such producer ceases production of the substance. Each such report shall be signed by a responsible corporate officer.

(b) OTHER REGULATED SUBSTANCES.—Within ninety days of the date on which a substance is placed on the list under subsection (b) of section 5, each person shall file a report with the Administrator setting forth the amount of the substance that was produced by such person during the twelve months preceding the date of listing. Not less than annually thereafter, each producer shall file a report with the Administrator setting forth the production levels of such substance in each successive twelve-month period until such producer ceases production of the substance. Each such report shall be signed by a responsible corporate officer.

SEC. 7. PRODUCTION PHASE-OUT OF SUBSTANCES ON THE PRIORITY LIST.

(a) PRODUCTION FREEZE.—Effective July 1, 1989, it shall be unlawful for any person to produce a substance listed under subsection (a) of Section 5 in annual quantities greater than that produced by such person during calendar year 1986.

(b) PHASE ONE REDUCTION.—Effective July 1, 1992, it shall be unlawful for any person to produce a substance listed under subsection (a) in Section 5 in annual quantities greater than 80 per centum of that produced by such person during calendar year 1986.

(c) PHASE TWO REDUCTION.—Effective July 1, 1995, it shall be unlawful for any person to produce a substance listed under subsection (a) in Section 5 in annual quantities greater than 50 per centum of that produced by such person during calendar year 1986.

(d) PHASE THREE REDUCTION.—Effective July 1, 1997, it shall be unlawful for any person to produce any quantity of a substance listed under subsection (a) of section 5 unless such person has, in accordance with subsection (e), received prior authorization to produce such substance.

(e) EXCEPTION FOR MEDICAL PURPOSES.—Notwithstanding the prohibition set forth in subsection (d), the Administrator, in consultation with the Commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration and after notice and opportunity for public comment, may authorize the production of limited quantities of a substance listed under subsection (a) of section 5 solely for medical purposes if such authorization is determined to be necessary for medical purposes.

SEC. 8. PRODUCTION PHASE-OUT EXCEPTION FOR NATIONAL SECURITY.

The President may issue such orders regarding production and use of halon-1211, halon-1301 and halon-2402, at any specified site or facility as may be necessary to protect the national security interests of the United States if the President finds that adequate substitutes are not available and that the production and use of such substance is necessary to protect such national security interests. Such orders may include, where necessary to protect such interests, an exemption from any requirement contained in this Act. The President shall notify the Congress within thirty days of the issuance of an order under this paragraph providing for any such exemption. Such notification shall include a statement of the reasons for the granting of the exemption. An exemption under this paragraph shall be for a specified period which may not exceed one year. Additional exemptions may be granted, each upon the President's issuance of a new order under this paragraph. Each such additional exemption shall be for a specified period which may not exceed one year. No exemption shall be granted under this paragraph due to lack of appropriation unless the President shall have specifically requested such appropriation as a part of the budgetary process and the Congress shall have failed to make available such requested appropriation.

SEC. 9. LIMITATIONS ON USE AND DISPOSAL.

(a) The Administrator shall, not later than July 1, 1991, promulgate regulations establishing standards and requirements regarding the use of substances covered by this Act. Such regulations shall include requirements that reduce the use and emission of such substances to the lowest achievable level and may include requirements to use alternative substances (including substances which are not covered by this Act), minimize use of substances covered by this Act, or maximize the recapture and recycling of substances covered by this Act.

(b) The Administration shall promulgate regulations establishing standards and requirements regarding the use of any manufactured substance that may, either directly as a radiatively important trace gas or indirectly as a substance that reduces the energy efficiency of products which incorporate or use such substance, exacerbate the problem of human induced global climate change.

(c) The Administrator shall, before January 1, 1994, promulgate regulations establishing standards and requirements for the recapture, recycling, and safe disposal of substances covered by this Act. Such regulations shall include requirements that:

(1) substances covered by this Act that are contained in bulk in appliances, machines or other goods (including but not limited to refrigerators and air conditioners) shall be removed from each such appliance, machine or other good prior to the disposal of such item;

(2) any appliance, machine or other good containing a substance covered by this Act in bulk shall not be manufactured or distributed in commerce unless it is equipped with a servicing aperture which will allow the recapture of such substance during service and repair of such item; and

(3) any product in which a substance covered by this Act is incorporated so as to constitute an inherent element of such product, including but not limited to rigid and soft foams, shall be disposed of in a manner that prevents the release of such substance into the environment.

(d) Effective January 1, 1993, it shall be unlawful for any person to knowingly vent into the atmosphere or otherwise knowingly use, release or dispose of any substance covered by this Act (other than halon-1211, halon-1301, and halon-2402) in a fashion which permits such substance to enter the environment. Releases associated with the approved use of medical devices and diagnostic products for medical purposes and de minimus releases associated with good faith attempts to recapture and recycle or safely dispose of any substance covered by this Act shall not be covered by the preceding sentence. The first sentence of this subsection shall not apply to releases associated with the servicing or repair of equipment which contains substances covered by this Act but does not include a servicing aperture which allows the recapture of such substances if, during the first servicing or repair after the effective date of this Act, such servicing aperture or other similar features are installed.

(e) Effective July 1, 1997, it shall be unlawful to introduce into interstate commerce or to use a substance listed under subsection (a) of section 5 except for medical purposes approved by the Commissioner of the Food and Drug Administration, in consultation with the Administrator, and, for a period not to exceed ten years after July 1, 1997, to maintain and service household appliances.

SEC. 10. LIMITATION ON OZONE DEPLETION POTENTIAL.

(a) Effective July 1, 1989, it shall be unlawful for any person to produce substances covered by this Act in annual quantities that, based upon the ozone depletion factor assigned to each such substance under subsection (c) of section 5, yield a total ozone depletion potential greater than that produced by such person during calendar year 1986. The prohibition set forth in the preceding sentence shall remain in effect until the effective date of regulations promulgated in accordance with subsection (b) or July 1, 1993, whichever is earlier.

(b) Prior to July 1, 1992, the Administrator shall promulgate regulations establishing production limitations for substances covered by this Act that, based upon the ozone depletion factor assigned to each such substance under subsection (c) of section 5 and calendar year 1986 production levels, yield not less than a 95 per centum reduction in total ozone depletion potential in 1997. If the Administrator fails to promulgate regulations in accordance with this subsection, effective July 1, 1997 it shall be unlawful for any person to produce substances covered by this Act in annual quantities that, based upon the ozone depletion factor assigned to each such substance under subsection (c) of section 5, yield a total ozone depletion potential greater than 5 per centum of that produced by such person during calendar year 1986.

SEC. 11. ACCELERATED SCHEDULE.

The Administrator shall promulgate regulations, after notice and opportunity for public comment, which require each producer to reduce its production of—

(1) a substance listed under subsection (a) of section 5 more rapidly than the schedule provided under this Act; or if the Administrator determines that such revised or specific schedule (A) based on new information regarding the harmful effects on the stratosphere or climate which may be associated with a listed substance, may be necessary to protect human health and the environment or (B) based on the availability of substitutes for a listed substance, is attainable. Any person may petition the Administrator to issue such regulations. The Administrator shall issue such regulations within one hundred and eighty days after receipt of any such petition, unless the Administrator determines that such regulations are not necessary and denies the petition. No less often than every 18 months, the Administrator shall, in response to a petition or otherwise, either publish such regulations or a determination that such regulations are not necessary.

(2) a substance listed under subsection (b) of section 5 on a specific schedule not otherwise provided for in this Act

SEC. 12. CERTIFICATION OF EQUIVALENT PROGRAMS.

(a) IMPORTS.—Effective twelve months after the date on which a substance is placed on the priority list under subsection (a) of section 5, it shall be unlawful for any person to import such substance, any product containing such substance, or any product manufactured with a process that uses such substance unless the Administrator, in consultation with the Secretary of State (the Secretary), has published a decision, after notice and opportunity for public comment, certifying that the nations in which such substance or product was manufactured and from which such substance or product is imported have established and are fully implementing programs that require reduced production of such listed substance, and limit production of other substances covered by this Act, on a schedule and in a manner that is at least as stringent as the reduction schedule for, and limitations on, domestic production which apply under this Act. The prohibition on the import of any product manufactured with a process that uses a substance listed under subsection (a) of section 5 shall include, after notice and opportunity for public comment, any product which the Administrator has reason to believe may have been manufactured with a process that uses such substance. The Administrator's decision that a product may have been manufactured with a process that uses such substance shall constitute a rebuttable presumption.

(b) CERTIFICATION OF NATIONAL PROGRAM.—The Administrator shall not certify any national program under subsection (a) unless it is determined that—

(1) the Nation has adopted legislation or regulations which give the reduction schedule for each listed substance the force of law; and

(2) the legislation or regulations include reporting requirements and enforcement provisions no less stringent than those specified in sections 6 and 14 of this Act, and that the information contained in such reports is available to the Administrator and the Secretary.

(c) REVOCATION.—At least annually, the Administrator, in consultation with the Secretary, shall review each certification made under this section and shall revoke such certification, after notice and opportunity for public comment, unless it is determined that the conditions of subsections (a) and (b) remain satisfied and that the reduction schedule for each listed substance is in fact being carried out in such nations. Any such revocation shall take effect one hundred and eighty days after notice of the revocation has been published.

(d) ALLOCATION.—Any person who imports a substance covered by this Act or a product containing such substance shall, for the purposes of section 7 (production phaseout for priority list) and section 10 (limitation on ozone depletion potential), shall be deemed to have produced an equivalent amount of such substance on the date of such importation.

SEC. 13. LABELING.

(a) Effective eighteen months after the date on which a substance is placed on a list maintained under subsection (a) or (b) of section 5, no container in which such substance is stored or transported, no product containing such substance, and no product manufactured with a process that uses a listed substance shall be introduced into interstate commerce unless it bears a label stating either of the following, as appropriate:

(1) "Contains (insert name of listed substance) a substance which harms public health and environment by destroying ozone in the upper atmosphere and by disrupting the climate".

(2) "Manufactured with (insert name of listed substance) a substance which harms public health and environment by destroying ozone in the upper atmosphere and by disrupting the climate".

The Administrator shall issue regulations to implement the labeling requirements of this section within one year after enactment of this section, after notice and opportunity for public comment. Such regulations shall require all containers and products which are subject to this section and introduced or reintroduced into commerce later than ninety days after promulgation of such regulations to bear the appropriate label.

SEC. 14. FEDERAL ENFORCEMENT.

(a) COMPLIANCE ORDERS.—(1) Whenever on the basis of any information the Administrator determines that any person has violated or is in violation of any requirement of this Act, the Administrator may issue an order assessing a civil penalty for any past or current violation, requiring compliance immediately or within a specified time period, or both, or the Administrator may commence a civil action in the United States district court in the district in which the violation occurred for appropriate relief, including a temporary or permanent injunction.

(2) Any order issued pursuant to this subsection may include a suspension or revocation of any permit issued by the Administrator under this Act and shall state with reasonable specificity the nature of the violation. Any penalty assessed in the order shall not exceed $25,000 per day of noncompliance for each violation of a requirement of this Act. In assessing such a penalty, the Administrator shall take into account the seriousness of the violation and any good faith efforts to comply with applicable requirements.

(b) PUBLIC HEARING.—Any order issued under this section shall become final unless, no later than thirty days after the order is served, the person or persons named therein request a public hearing. Upon such request the Administrator shall promptly conduct a public hearing. In connection with any proceeding under this section the Administrator may issue subpenas for the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of relevant papers, books, and documents, and may promulgate rules for discovery procedures.

(c) VIOLATION OF COMPLIANCE ORDERS.—If a violator fails to take corrective action within the time specified in a compliance order, the Administrator may assess a civil penalty of not more than $25,000 for each day of continued noncompliance with the order and the Administrator may suspend or revoke any permit issued to the violator.

(d) CRIMINAL PENALTIES.—Any person who—

(1) knowingly exceeds the production limits under section 7 (production phase-out for initial list) or section 10 (limitation on ozone depletion potential);

(2) knowingly introduces into interstate commerce a substance that was produced in violation of section 7 or section 10;

(3) knowingly imports a substance listed under subsection (a) of section 5, a product containing such substance, or a product manufactured with a process that uses such substance, in violation of section 12 (certification of equivalent programs);

(4) knowingly vents or releases a substance into the environment in violation of section 9 (limitations on use and disposal);

(5) knowingly introduces into interstate commerce a substance or product in violation of section 9 (limitation on use and disposal) or section 13 (labeling);

(6) knowingly omits material information or makes any false material statement or representation in any application, record, report, permit, or other document filed, maintained, or used for purposes of compliance with this Act; or shall, upon conviction, be subject to a fine in accordance with title 18 of the United States Code for each day of a violation, or imprisonment not to exceed two years, or both. If conviction is for a violation committed after a first conviction of such person under this paragraph, the maximum punishment under the respective paragraph shall be doubled with respect to both fine and imprisonment.

(7) knowingly produces, transports, distributes, or uses any substance listed under section 5, a product containing such substance, or a product manufactured with a process that uses such substance, and who knowingly destroys, alters, conceals, or fails to file any record, application, report, or other document required to be maintained or filed for purposes of compliance with this Act.

(e) CIVIL PENALTY.—Any person who violates any requirement of this Act shall be liable to the United States for a civil penalty in an amount not to exceed $25,000 for each such violation.

(f) VIOLATIONS.—Each day of violation of any requirement of this Act shall, for purposes of this section, constitute a separate violation. In addition, for purposes of section 7 (production phase-out for initial list), section 9 (limitation on use and disposal), section 10 (limitation on ozone depletion potential), and paragraphs (1), (2), (3), and (5) of subsection (d) of this section, the production, introduction into commerce, or importation of each one hundred pounds of a substance listed under subsection (a) of section 5 that is in excess of the production limits under section 7 or section 10 shall constitute a separate violation.

SEC. 15. JUDICIAL REVIEW OF FINAL REGULATIONS AND CERTAIN PETITIONS.

Any judicial review of any final action of the Administrator pursuant to this Act shall be in accordance with sections 701 through 706 of title 5 of the United States Code, except that—

(1) a petition for review of any final action of the Administrator may be filed by any interested person in the Circuit Court of Appeals of the United States for the Federal judicial district in which such person resides or transacts business, and such petition shall be filed within ninety days from the date of such promulgation or denial or after such date if such petition is for review based solely on grounds arising after such ninetieth day; action of the Administrator with respect to which review could have been obtained under this subsection shall not be subject to judicial review in civil or criminal proceedings for enforcement; and

(2) if a party seeking review under this Act applies to the court for leave to adduce additional evidence, and shows to the satisfaction of the court that the information is material and that there were reasonable grounds for the failure to adduce such evidence in the proceeding before the Administrator, the court may order such additional evidence (and evidence in rebuttal thereof) to be taken before the Administrator, and to be adduced upon the hearing in such manner and upon such terms and conditions as the court may deem proper; the Administrator may modify administrative findings as to the facts, or make new findings, by reason of the additional evidence so taken, and shall file with the court such modified or new findings and the Administrator's recommendation, if any, for the modification or setting aside of the original administrative order, with the return of such additional evidence.

SEC. 16. CITIZEN SUITS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Except as provided in subsection (b) or (c) of this section, any person may commence a civil action on his own behalf—

(1) against any person (including (a) the United States, and (b) any other governmental instrumentality or agency, to the extent permitted by the eleventh amendment to the Constitution) who is alleged to be in violation of any permit, regulation, condition, requirement, prohibition, or order which has become effective pursuant to this Act; or

(2) against the Administrator where there is alleged a failure of the Administrator to perform any act or duty under this Act which is not discretionary with the Administrator. Any action under paragraph (a)(1) of this subsection shall be brought in the district court for the district in which the alleged violation occurred. Any action brought under paragraph (a)(2) of this subsection may be brought in the district court for the district in which the alleged violation occurred or the District Court of the District of Columbia. The district court shall have jurisdiction, without regard to the amount in controversy or the citizenship of the parties, to enforce the permit, regulation, condition, requirement, prohibition, or order, referred to in paragraph (1), to order such person to take such other action as may be necessary, or both, or to order the Administrator to perform the act or duty referred to in paragraph (2), as the case may be, and to apply any appropriate civil penalties under section 14.

(b) ACTIONS PROHIBITED.—No action may be commenced under subsection (a)(1) of this section—

(1) prior to sixty days after the plaintiff has given notice of the violation to—

(A) the Administrator; and

(B) to any alleged violator of such permit, regulation, condition, requirement, prohibition, or order; or

(2) if the Administrator has commenced and is diligently prosecuting a civil or criminal action in a court of the United States to require compliance with such permit, regulation, condition, requirement, prohibition, or order.

In any action under subsection (a)(1), any person may intervene as a matter of right. Any action respecting a violation under this Act may be brought under this section only in the judicial district in which such alleged violation occurs.

(c) NOTICE.—No action may be commenced under paragraph (a)(2) of this section prior to sixty days after the plaintiff has given notice to the Administrator that he will commence such action. Notice under this subsection shall be given in such manner as the Administrator shall prescribe by regulation.

(d) INTERVENTION.—In any action under this section the Administrator, if not a party, may intervene as a matter of right.

(e) COSTS.—The court, in issuing any final order in any action brought pursuant to this section or section 15, may award costs of litigation (including reasonable attorneys and expert witness fees) to the prevailing or substantially prevailing party, whenever the court determines such an award is appropriate. The court may, if a temporary restraining order or preliminary injunction is sought, require the filing of a bond or equivalent security in accordance with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

(f) OTHER RIGHTS PRESERVED.—Nothing in this section shall restrict any right which any person (or class of persons) may have under any statute or common law to seek enforcement of any standard or requirement or to seek any other relief (including relief against the Administrator).

SEC. 17. SEPARABILITY.

If any provision of this Act, or the application of any provision of this Act to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, and the remainder of this Act, shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 18. RELATIONSHIP OF OTHER LAWS.

(a) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to alter or affect the authority of the Administrator under the Clean Air Act or the Toxic Substances Control Act or to affect the authority of any other department, agency, or instrumentality of the United States under any provision of law to promulgate or enforce any requirement respecting the control of any substance, practice, process, or activity for purposes of protecting the stratosphere or ozone in the stratosphere.

(b) Nothing in this Act shall preclude or deny any State or political subdivision thereof from adopting or enforcing any requirement respecting the control of any substances, practice, process, or activity for purposes of protecting the stratosphere or ozone in the stratosphere.

SEC. 19. AUTHORITY OF ADMINISTRATION.

The Administrator is authorized to prescribe such regulations as are necessary to carry out this Act.

By Mr. BOSCHWITZ (for himself, Mr. JEFFORDS, and Mr. SANFORD):

S. 492. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to provide that the amount of the earned income tax credit will be related to family size; to the Committee on Finance.

JOB ENHANCEMENT FOR FAMILIES ACT

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, I rise today to reintroduce the Job Enhancement for Families Act [JEFFA], along with Senator JIM JEFFORDS and Senator TERRY SANFORD. JEFFA increases the maximum earned income tax credit [EITC] for a low-income working family with one child and adjusts the credit for family size.

During the 1960's and 1970's, Congress sought to eliminate any Federal income tax liability for families whose income fell below the poverty level. Several approaches were used in tax legislation enacted during this period, including increases in the personal exemption and standard deduction and the EITC.

Of course, the Tax Reform Act of 1986 virtually eliminates tax burdens for millions of low-income taxpayers. We increased the standard deduction to $5,200 and the personal exemption to $2,000 effective this year. We also increased the EITC credit percentage from 11 to 14 percent and indexed the income threshold for inflation. As a result, for a family of four, the tax threshold has been increased from the pretax reform level of $9,575 to more than $15,000.

In spite of all we have achieved, the current EITC has two shortcomings: It does not, in my opinion, provide enough financial support to keep a low-income family above the poverty level, especially when one considers the added financial burden of raising more than one child. For many low-income families, the cost of providing child care so that one or both parents can work is, by itself, an insurmountable obstacle.

My bill addresses these deficiencies by increasing the maximum benefit for a family with one child to $1,000, from the 1989 level of $910 under current law. In addition, I propose to increase the maximum benefit in relation to family size so that a family with two children would be eligible for a $1,500 credit; the credit for three children would be $2,000; and for four children or more it would be $2,500.

If enacted, these changes will meaningfully affect low-income families, where at least one parent is working. For example, using a family of three as an example, the $2,000 credit would represent an hourly pay increase of $1; for a family of four, the $2,500 credit would represent an hourly pay increase equal to $1.25. Under my bill, more welfare recipients will have an incentive to enter the work force and more parents of low-income families will be able to remain in the work force.

Mr. President, I firmly believe we must do a better job of targeting Federal assistance to those most in need. We also should avoid enacting legislation that removes incentives to work. The bill I am introducing today satisfies both of these criteria. I welcome the support and cosponsorship of my colleagues and urge the Finance Committee to consider my bill at the earliest opportunity.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 492

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Job Enhancement for Families Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. INCREASE IN EARNED INCOME TAX CREDIT.

(a) INCREASE IN AMOUNTS OF CREDIT.—Subsections (a) and (b) of section 32 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (relating to earned income tax credit) are amended to read as follows:

"(a) ALLOWANCE OF CREDIT.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—In the case of an eligible individual, there shall be allowed as a credit against the tax imposed by this subtitle for the taxable year an amount equal to the credit percentage of so much of the earned income for the taxable year as does not exceed $7,143.

"(2) LIMITATION.—The amount of the credit allowable to a taxpayer under this subsection for any taxable year shall not exceed the excess (if any) of—

"(A) the credit percentage of $7,143, over

"(B) the phaseout percentage of so much of the adjusted gross income (or, if greater, the earned income) of the taxpayer for the taxable year as exceeds $8,000.

"(b) PERCENTAGES.—For purposes of subsection (a)—

"In the case of an eligible individual with:	The credit percentage is:	The phaseout percentage is:
"No or 1 qualifying child	14	8.8
"2 qualifying children	21	13.2
"3 qualifying children	28	17.6
"4 or more qualifying children	35	22."

(b) INFLATION ADJUSTMENTS.—

(1) Paragraph (1) of section 32(i) of such Code is amended—

(i) by striking out "the applicable calendar year" and inserting "1990",

(ii) by striking out "paragraph (2)(B)" and inserting "subsection (a)", and

(iii) by striking out "1984" in subparagraph (B) and inserting "1989".

(2) Section 32(i) of such Code is amended by striking out paragraph (2) and by redesignating paragraph (3) as paragraph (2).

(c) QUALIFYING CHILD.—Subsection (c) of section 32 of such Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(3) QUALIFYING CHILD.—The term 'qualifying child' means any child (within the meaning of section 151(c)(3)) of the eligible individual who is taken into account in determining such individual's eligibility for the credit allowable under this section."

(d) CONFORMING AMENDMENT.—Paragraph (2) of section 32(f) of such Code is amended by striking out "subsection (b)" each place it appears in subparagraphs (A) and (B) and inserting in lieu therof "subsection (a)(2)".

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself and Mr. D'AMATO):

S. 493. A bill to amend the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation Act; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

FEDERAL HOME LOAN MORTGAGE CORPORATION TRANSITION ACT

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I introduce today the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation Transition Act, which will give Freddie Mac a modern board suited to its current and future role in the Nation's mortgage finance system. I am pleased that the distinguished Senator from New York, Mr. D'AMATO, joins with me as a cosponsor.

Congress created Freddie Mac in 1970 as a federally chartered corporation that creates a continuous flow of funds to mortgage lenders in support of homeownership and rental housing.

Freddie Mac's importance to housing finance has grown dramatically in recent years. This legislation will ensure that a strong Freddie Mac will continue to provide affordable home finance for America's homebuyers.

This bill is very important to the Nation's housing.

It would provide Freddie Mac with a new 18-member board of directors, with 5 members appointed by the President and the rest elected by stockholders.

This would give Freddie Mac the same, market-oriented corporate structure as its sister corporation, the Federal National Mortgage Association—Fannie Mae.

An interim board—including the Chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, the president of Freddie Mac, and the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development—would serve until the new board can be elected.

The bill gives the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development regulatory authority over Freddie Mac. It also gives the Secretary of Treasury authority to approve the rate and maturity of Freddie Mac's unsecured debt obligations. This parallels the current regulatory structure for Fannie Mae.

The bill will convert Freddie Mac's outstanding preferred stock to voting common stock. The bill will also provide Freddie Mac with standby credit now provided to Fannie Mae.

Currently, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board functions as Freddie Mac's board of directors. That arrangement has become increasingly unsatisfactory as Freddie Mac has grown in importance. At times it has created conflicts between the board members' responsibilities as the Bank Board and their responsibilities as Freddie Mac's board of directors.

A reform of Freddie Mac's corporate structure is long overdue. In recent weeks, it has become urgently needed.

The Bush administration's recent proposal to eliminate the Federal Home Loan Bank Board makes it impossible to continue with the current corporate structure any longer.

Several hastily conceived proposals have recently been floated from several sources in the administration. They have caused alarm among leading analysts of the secondary mortgage market.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that copies of two recent reports from Wall Street analysts be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

With rising interest rates and growing concern about the affordability of home ownership, this is certainly no time for make-shift experiments with Freddie Mac's corporate structure.

Our legislation provides the sound course of action. It provides Freddie Mac with the proven, market-oriented structure that has long served Fannie Mae so well.

I am confident that our legislation will remove the fears that Freddie Mac may inadvertently be harmed by actions related to the FSLIC crisis. Those fears are unnecessary.

In recent years, Congress has consistently acted to ensure that Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae remain as strong, stable supports for the country's private home finance system. I am confident that this strong congressional commitment will continue.

Freddie Mac and Fannie Mae have maintained lively competition to serve America's mortgage lenders in every region of the country, throughout cycles in the economy. That has greatly benefitted America's homebuyers, providing them with the lowest possible interest rates.

This legislation ensures that these two pillars of America's mortgage finance system will continue to compete on equal terms and in the national interest.

Freddie Mac's achievements are remarkable. Since Congress created Freddie Mac in 1970, it has provided homes for 7.3 million homeowners and apartments for over 500,000 renters. In California alone, Freddie Mac has helped provide homeownership to over 1.3 million households.

The legislation we introduce today is timely. It is prudent. It is urgently needed. I urge my colleagues to join us to ensure the bill's early enactment.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 493

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation Transition Act".

SEC. 2. PURPOSE.

The purposes of this Act are—

(1) to provide stability in the secondary market for home mortgages,

(2) to provide that the operations of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation respond appropriately to the private capital market, and

(3) to ensure that the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation continues to provide supplementary assistance to the secondary market for home mortgages by providing a degree of liquidity for mortgage investments thereby improving the distribution of investment capital available for home mortgage financing.

SEC. 3. TRANSITION OF BOARD.

(a) NEW BOARD.—Section 303(a) of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation Act is amended to read as follows:

"(a)(1) There is created the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation, which shall be a body corporate and shall be under the direction of a Board of Directors. Within the limitations of law and regulation, the Board of Directors shall determine the general policies which shall govern the operations of the Corporation. The principal office of the Corporation shall be in the District of Columbia or at such other place as the Corporation may from time to time prescribe.

"(2) The Corporation shall have a Board of Directors which shall consist of 18 persons, 5 of whom shall be appointed annually by the President of the United States, and the remainder of whom shall be elected annually by the voting common stockholders. The Board of Directors shall at all times have as members appointed by the President of the United States at least one person from the homebuilding industry, at least one person from the mortgage lending industry, and at least one person from the real estate industry. Each member of the Board of Directors shall be appointed or elected for a term ending on the date of the next annual meeting of the voting common stockholders, except that any appointed member may be removed from office by the President of the United States for good cause, and any elected member may be removed from office for good cause under such procedures as shall be prescribed by the Corporation. Any appointive seat which becomes vacant shall be filled by appointment of the President of the United States, but only for the unexpired portion of the term. Any elective seat on the Board of Directors which becomes vacant after the annual election of the directors shall be filled by the Board of Directors, but only for the unexpired portion of the term. Any member of the Board of Directors who is a full-time officer or employee of the Federal Government shall not, as such member, receive compensation for services as such a member.".

(b) TRANSITIONAL PROVISION.—There shall be an interim Board of Directors of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation which shall serve from the date of enactment of this section until the date of the first meeting of the voting common shareholders of the Corporation at which the first election of the directors elected by the shareholders occurs. The interim Board of Directors shall consist of the President of the Corporation, the persons who were, on the day prior to the date of enactment of this section, the Chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, or his or her designee, and the Secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, or his or her designee. A quorum of the interim Board of Directors shall consist of a majority of the directors duly serving from time to time. The first meeting for election of directors shall occur, under such procedures as shall be specified by the Corporation, within 6 months following the date of enactment of this section.

SEC. 4. REGULATORY POWER.

Section 303 of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation Act is amended—

(1) by redesignating sections (b) through (f) as sections (c) through (g) respectively, and

(2) by inserting after subsection (a) the following:

"(b)(1) The Secretary of Housing and Urban Development shall have general regulatory power over the Corporation, which shall not extend to the Corporation's internal affairs, and shall make such rules and regulations as shall be necessary and proper to ensure that the purposes of this title are accomplished. The Secretary may require that a reasonable portion of the Corporation's mortgage purchases be related to the national goal of providing adequate housing for low- and moderate-income families, but with reasonable economic return to the Corporation. In any one fiscal year, the aggregate amount of cash dividends paid by the Corporation on account of any share of its common stock shall not exceed any rate which may be determined from time to time by the Secretary to be a fair rate of return after consideration of the current earnings and capital condition of the Corporation. The Secretary may examine and audit the books and financial transactions of the Corporation, and the Secretary may require the Corporation to make such reports on its activities as he deems advisable. Pursuant to the authority provided in this subsection, the Secretary shall, not later than June 30 of each year, report to the Congress on the activities of the Corporation under this title.

"(2) If the Corporation submits to the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development a request for approval or other action under this title, the Secretary shall, not later than the expiration of the 45-day period following the submission of such request, approve such request or transmit to the Congress a report explaining why such request has not been approved. Such period may be extended for an additional 15-day period if the Secretary requests additional information from the Corporation, but such 45-day period may not be extended for any other reason or for any period in addition to or other than such 15-day period. If the Secretary fails to transmit such report to the Congress within such 45-day period or 60-day period, as the case may be, the Corporation may proceed as if such request had been approved.".

SEC. 5. COMMON STOCK.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Section 304(a) of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation Act is amended to read as follows:

"(a)(1) The common stock of the Corporation shall consist of—

"(A) nonvoting common stock, which shall be issued only to Federal home loan banks, and

"(B) voting common stock, which shall be issued to such holders, in such manner and amount, and subject to such limitations on concentration of ownership, as the Corporation prescribes.

"(2) The nonvoting common stock and the voting common stock shall have such par value and such other characteristics as the Corporation prescribes. The voting common stock shall be vested with all voting rights, each share being entitled to one vote. The free transferability of the voting common stock at all times to any person, firm, corporation or other entity shall not be restricted except that, as to the Corporation, it shall be transferable only on the books of the Corporation. Nonvoting common stock of the Corporation shall be evidenced in such manner and shall be transferable only to such extent, to such transferees, and in such manner, as the Corporation prescribes.".

(b) CONVERSION OF STOCK.—On the date of enactment of this Act, each share of outstanding senior participating preferred stock of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation, with a par value of $2.50 per share, shall be changed into and shall become one share of voting common stock of the Corporation. Such voting common stock shall, with respect to the nonvoting common stock of the Corporation, retain all of the rights, priorities and privileges of the senior participating preferred stock and the transformation of the senior participating preferred stock into voting common stock accomplished by this subsection shall be deemed to satisfy the Corporation's obligation to redeem senior participating preferred stock for non-callable common stock.

(c) CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.—(1) Section 304(b) of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation Act is amended by inserting "nonvoting" before "common".

(2) Section 304(c) of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation Act is amended by striking "such" and by inserting "nonvoting common" before the word "stock".

(3) Section 304(d) of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation Act is amended by inserting "nonvoting common" before "stock" each time it appears.

SEC. 6. FEES.

Section 305(a)(1) of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation Act is amended by adding at the end thereof: "Nothing in this section authorizes the Corporation to impose any charge or fee upon any mortgagee approved by the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development for participation in any mortgage insurance program under the National Housing Act solely because of such status".

SEC. 7. STANDBY CREDIT.

Section 306(c) of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation Act is amended to read as follows:

"(c) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized in his or her discretion to purchase any obligations issued pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, as now or hereafter in force, and for such purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public debt transaction the proceeds of the sale of any securities hereafter issued under chapter 31 of title 31, United States Code, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under chapter 31 of title 31, United States Code, are extended to include such purposes. The Secretary of Treasury shall not at any time purchase any obligations under this subsection if such purchase would increase the aggregate principal amount of his then outstanding holdings of such obligations under this subsection to an amount greater than $2,250,000,000. Each purchase of obligations by the Secretary of the Treasury under this subsection shall be upon such terms and conditions as to yield a return at a rate determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, taking into consideration the current average rate on outstanding marketable obligations of the United States as of the last day of the month preceding the making of such purchase. The Secretary of the Treasury may, at any time, sell, upon such terms and conditions and at such price or prices as he shall determine, any of the obligations acquired by him under this subsection. All redemptions, purchases and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of such obligations under this subsection shall be treated as public debt transactions of the United States.".

SEC. 8. TERMS OF OBLIGATIONS.

Section 306 of the Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation Act is amended by adding at the end the following:

"(j) Any notes, debentures, or substantially identical types of unsecured obligations of the Corporation evidencing money borrowed, whether general or subordinated, shall have such maturities and bear such rate or rates of interest as may be determined by the Corporation with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.".

SMITH BARNEY ANALYST'S REPORT, FEBRUARY 17, 1989

FREDDIE MAC

Recommendation: Neutral.

Earnings per share: Qtr 1988A $1.45.

Fiscal Year: 1988 actual, $5.73; 1989 estimate, $5.05; 1990 estimate, $5.75.

We have (unhappily) moved Freddie Mac from a Buy to a Neutral in response to its Board's decision last week to recommend a change in its corporate structure. Briefly, preferred shareholders under the new proposal would only get to elect three Board members, the rest being either government officials, Presidential appointees or elected by the new Board itself. We especially dislike the proposed because:

We think preferred shareholders should be appalled by this suggestion for three reasons:

1. Three votes out of thirteen is not control, period.

2. Investors need to remember how close Fannie Mae came in the late 1970s to become what amounted to a "source of funds" for then Carter Administration's social programs. A narrow majority on the Board was the only thing that ultimately protected shareholders' rights. Freddie Mac without a shareholders-elected Board is an easier prey for a Congress and President looking for funds to solve the FSLIC crisis.

3. It has become quite clear that Freddie Mac CEO, Leland Brendsel, however he may feel personally, does not represent preferred shareholders but quite properly reports to his own Board. He can't publicly lobby for a Fannie Mae style Board if Freddie Mac chairman Danny Wall has other ideas. So who represents the preferred shareholders?

SUMMARY AND RECOMMENDATION

The Bush Administration's proposal to restructure the thrift industry's regulatory process—which was finalized this week—contained an unpleasant surprise for Freddie Mac's shareholders and management.

The proposal would place two Cabinet members or their designates on a three-member Board of Directors for Freddie Mac. This measure would tend to place Freddie Mac far closer to the maelstrom of the political process and could jeopardize the tradition of selecting Freddie Mac's management on the basis of professional merit rather than political qualifications.

Fortunately, Freddie Mac's traditional supporters—including thrift institutions, mortgage bankers, realtors, and homebuilders—are certain to oppose this measure, and their chances of success exceed 80 percent. Nevertheless, we view the dangers to Freddie Mac here as serious; shareholders should continue to keep their eyes on this issue until the administration's proposal is clearly removed from the legislative agenda.

On the good news front this week, Freddie Mac raised its annual dividend from $1.25 to $1.60. We believe the company has left itself enough room for a dividend increase of comparable magnitude in early 1990.

We are maintaining our sell recommendation on Freddie Mac; our reasoning remains that Freddie Mac is still more likely to prove the stellar performer between the two companies.

THE BUSH ADMINISTRATION PROPOSAL: MORE THAN JUST BUREAUCRATIC GOBBLEDY-GOOK

The Bush Administration's proposal would place as Freddie Mac's three directors (1) the chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank System, (2) the Secretary of the Treasury or his designate, and (3) the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) or his designate. Freddie Mac's current Board consists of the three members of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board (FHLBB), the federal agency whose primary responsibilities currently include regulating the savings and loan industry and managing the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation (FSLIC).

While this proposed change may sound at first like bureaucratic gobbledy-gook, it actually could have profound significance for Freddie Mac's day to day operations.

We have never liked the current corporate governance arrangement at Freddie Mac; the only compliment we can give is that the new proposal is worse. So far, despite its bureaucratic proximity to day-to-day politics, Freddie Mac's management team has remained nonpolitical. Whatever the weaknesses of the FHLBB, it is an independent regulatory agency with members appointed for fixed terms; over the last twenty years the FHLBB members have used their independence to choose executives at Freddie Mac on the basis of professional excellence rather than political criteria.

On the other hand, placing Cabinet members or their designates as two members of a three member Board would virtually ensure job insecurity among top executives at Freddie Mac every time there was a change in administrations. Policy priorities would also be subject to change. The Secretary of HUD or his designate under some regimes is likely to view low-income housing as an important public objective. Despite our sympathy for the plight of the homeless and other destitute groups our financial preference would be to keep their problems as far away from Freddie Mac as possible.

Freddie Mac's current ties to the political process have already incurred some damage at Freddie Mac, particularly regarding compensation for upper management. Concerned about the negative publicity that might ensue if they paid Freddie Mac's top executives "too much," the FHLBB has allowed executive pay schedules to lag behind those of the private sector. Despite the lifting of restrictions on Freddie Mac's ownership, the FHLBB has not yet indicated whether it plans to compensate Freddie Mac's management with stock options. In contrast, Fannie Mac's management at all levels enjoys several lucrative stock option programs—a factor which we believe has contributed to the excellence of management at that company. We believed previously that the recent broadening of Freddie Mac's stock ownership would eventually result in the company's executives receiving compensation packages similar to those received at other large publicly traded companies. The newly proposed Board of Directors arrangement would cast considerable doubt on that scenario.

The one silver lining in the cloud may be that the Administration's proposal will focus shareholders and the housing related interest groups on how much they have to lose here. Mortgage bankers especially depend on Freddie Mac as a primary avenue for their products into the secondary market. Three key Freddie Mac constituencies—the mortgage bankers, realtors, and homebuilders—are virtually certain to oppose the proposal. All three groups are well diversified geographically, resulting in the ability to place pressure on every member of the Congress. Each group is also a powerhouse in the game of campaign contributions. One other potential ally—the thrifts—may be absent from the usual coalition here; they have much bigger fish to fry regarding other details of the Bush legislation.

While there are clearly risks, the Bush proposal is likely to galvanize efforts to push for an expanded Freddie Mac board modeled after Fannie Mae's. We would view the advent of a Fannie Mae type board arrangement as a clear-cut positive for Freddie Mac.

DIVIDEND INCREASE: $1.25 TO $1.60

Freddie Mac's Board voted to increase dividend levels to an annual level of $1.60 in 1989, up from $1.25 in 1988. The increase—while welcome—was expected. Freddie Mac's policy is to pay out 20 percent to 30 percent of expected earnings for the year as dividends. Assuming 1990 earnings come in north of $6.50—which appears likely—Freddie Mac has left itself enough room for another dividend increase next year.

By Mr. DURENBERGER (for himself, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. DOLE, Mr. WALLOP, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. BOREN, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. BOSCHWITZ, Mr. SIMON, Mr. BURDICK, and Mr. SANFORD):

S. 494. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to extend for 5 years, and increase the amount of, the deduction for health insurance for self-employed individuals; to the Committee on Finance.

HEALTH INSURANCE COSTS OF SELF-EMPLOYED INDIVIDUALS

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation that would extend for 5 years the current 25-percent tax deduction that is available for the purchase of health insurance by self-employed individuals and unincorporated small businesses. I am pleased that Senators PRYOR, DOLE, WALLOP, DANFORTH, BOREN, BAUCUS, D'AMATO, BOSCHWITZ, BURDICK, SIMON, and SANFORD have joined in cosponsoring this legislation which brings a degree of equity to the farmers and small business owners of America.

Unless this legislation is adopted before the end of this year, the current 25-percent deduction will terminate. I believe that would be totally inequitable and unfair to the small business people and farmers of America who need health insurance every bit as much as the executives and employees of corporations.

Mr. President, this legislation represents a small step toward making affordable health insurance available to all working people. While Congress has allowed large corporations a 100-percent deduction for the cost of health insurance for employees and retired employees, it was not until the Tax Reform Act of 1986 that Congress adopted the provision temporarily allowing the modest 25-percent tax deduction for the self-employed. And as a condition for taking advantage of this modest deduction, small firms must provide health insurance to their employees on a nondiscriminatory basis. This legislation continues this requirement.

Mr. President, the 25-percent health insurance deduction should be viewed as a modest first step toward bringing fairness and equity to the small businesses and farmers of our country. I believe the deduction should be equal to the deduction allowed corporations, and I plan on introducing legislation later in the session to achieve that result. In the meantime, it is imperative that the unincorporated small businesses and family farmers of this Nation be assured that we will not allow the current tax deduction to lapse.●

● Mr. PRYOR. Mr. President, today Senator DURENBERGER and I rise to introduce a bill to allow sole proprietors and self-employed individuals to continue to take a 25-percent deduction for health insurance costs. The provision of the Internal Revenue Code allowing this deduction is scheduled to expire after December 31, 1989.

The deduction of health insurance is another example of the Internal Revenue Code favoring large businesses at the expense of the small business man or woman. If a company is incorporated, it can deduct the full cost of providing health insurance as an ordinary and necessary business expense. Additionally, the employees of these companies do not have to include the value of those benefits in their income. However, the small ma and pa grocery or drug store may not take any deduction if Congress allows this provision to sunset.

In my mind the 25-percent deduction does not go far enough. Eventually I would like to see Congress pass a law to allow a 100-percent deduction. Senator DURENBERGER and I are in agreement, however, that at this time it is an important first step to preserve the present 25-percent deduction. I look forward to working with him in the future to increase the deduction.

Congress hears a great deal about the plight of the uninsured. An important step toward helping these individuals obtain health insurance coverage is leveling the treatment of health insurance costs for large and small businesses in the Internal Revenue Code. I hope that Congress and the Committee on Finance will expedite passage of this important legislation.●

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, the legislation we are introducing today will help remedy the problem of employees of small businesses who either have no health insurance coverage or have inadequate health insurance coverage. The legislation will extend for 5 years the deduction for 25 percent of the amounts paid for health insurance for self-employed individuals, their spouses, and the dependents.

This provision is very important for farmers and small businesses. We added it to the Code in 1986 because access to employer-provided health plans is lowest with small employers—particularly with small, self-employed employers.

I am proud to have introduced the legislation in the 99th Congress which led to this deduction being added to the Code and I am proud to be here today to make sure that it is extended for 5 years.●

By Mr. HEINZ (for himself and Mr. HATCH):

S. 495. A bill to amend title 10, United States Code, to encourage increased utilization of domestic firms in the performance of Department of Defense contracts; to the Committee on Armed Services.

PERFORMANCE OF DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE CONTRACTS BY DOMESTIC FIRMS

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, in recent years the Department of Defense has been awarding greater numbers of military contracts to foreign companies. From 1980 to 1987 contracts to foreign firms totaled $46 billion. One noticeable example of this trend has been the replacement of the venerable Colt .45 sidearm by the Italian produced Beretta.

It can be argued that to a certain extent this type of cross-production is good, as it helps to standardize NATO weapons. Yet the benefits of shared hardware and technology necessary for efficient war-making by NATO forces must be tempered by a realization that the United States may need to act alone. Unlike sidearms, which can be substituted relatively easily, computer chips necessary for advanced weapons systems are vital. Should the United States ever be cutoff from the overseas sources of these chips, some of our most important systems may very well be rendered inoperable, or at least irreplaceable. The following is a list of systems dependent on foreign computer chips provided by the Final Report of the Defense Science Board on the Defense Industrial and Technology Base: Global Positioning System, Integrated Underwater Surveillance System, Defense Satellite Communication System, Fleet Satellite Communication System SSQ AN-53B Sonobuoy, F-16 Fighting Falcon, AIM-7 Sparrow air-to-air missile AM-6988 Poet Decoy Army Helicopter Improvement Program APG-63 Airborne Radar (for F-15 M1-Abrams, and F/A-18 Hornet.

It should be readily apparent that the security of the United States is dependent as much upon its industrial and technological resources as upon its current military forces. As the report of the Under Secretary for Acquisition to the Secretary of Defense, "Bolstering Defense Industrial Competitiveness," states.

The vitality of our manufacturing economy in general ultimately determines the war-fighting power of our nation's force structure. The economy's latent capability to enhance current forces in response to strategic threats is a critical element of our deterrence strategy.

Yet the manufacturing economy cannot have latent capability if it currently does not produce. The report continues—

Many basic industries of importance to defense production have declined, threatening the responsiveness of our industrial base. Left unchecked, such erosion could rob the United States of industrial capabilities critical to national security.

This is not a far-fetched warning. Current domestic production of televisions, VCR's and telephones is almost nil. If it can happen to consumer-based industries, what is the future for defense-based industries?

It has been my observation, as well as that of others, that over the past 7 years the Department of Defense has reduced its purchases from U.S. sources in those situations where it could have legally made a choice between American- and foreign-sourced products. Although these actions have probably not been inconsistent with current law, they have had an adverse impact on the continued viability of American defense industries, which in turn could have long term effects on our national security, especially in times of crisis.

Accordingly, I asked the General Accounting Office to analyze DOD procurement practices to ascertain whether they also observed this change occurring. I also asked for a judgment as to the impact of any such change on the health of the domestic industries affected by it.

The GAO report on the Defense Department's assessment of industries critical to the defense industrial base did not show significant increases in the value of DOD prime contracts awarded to foreign sources but made clear that there is no adequate data maintained on subcontracting for parts and components. Obviously, the problem of a weakened industrial base is not related simply to the health of prime contractors; rather it is also closely tied to awards of subcontracts to foreign bidders. It is the small American businessman who is injured by such a policy, a policy which often unfairly favors highly subsidized bids by foreign competitors.

In reviewing the defense industrial base with the help of the Logistics Management Institute [LMI], a Federal Funded Research and Development Center, the Defense Department concluded that the following are the top 25 defense critical industries which have been most adversely affected by these trends in the past 6 years: steel springs; industry trucks and tractors; nonmetallic mineral products; asbestos products; rubber and plastic footwear; farm machinery and equipment; finishing plants not elsewhere classified [NEC]; metal barrels, drums, and pails; hoists, cranes, and monorails; electrical industrial apparatus [NEC]; steel foundries [NEC]; machine tools and metal cutting; boot and shoe cut stock and findings; fur goods; construction machinery; footwear, except rubber [NEC]; carbon and graphite products; men's and boy's outerwear; textile machinery; textile bags; hats, caps, and millinery; sewing machinery; and motorcycles and bicycles.

I would note in passing, in view of past debates in the Senate, the high ranking of footwear and textile categories on this list. Although ranked in order of damage and not in order of importance to DOD, these nonetheless are all items determined to be defense critical.

Mr. President, this is only the top of the list. My office has heard many complaints from critical industries who believe that they may have been adversely affected by DOD procurement practices. Most notable among them are ball and roller bearings, iron and steel forgings, screw machine products and fasteners, and semiconductors and related products. The following data reflects the adverse trends which these industries are experiencing.

Imports' share of our market, a primary indicator of competitiveness, for ball and roller bearings increased from 12.2 percent to 16.6 percent and screw machine products rose from zero to 10.0 in the period 1980 to 1986.

Change in capacity is another important indicator of an industry's health. The measure of capacity growth that LMI selected is practical capacity: The maximum level of production possible with the equipment in place and a realistic work schedule. For iron and steel forgings, that figure decreased by 1.4 percent from 1980 to 1985. During this period, U.S. overall manufacturing capacity grew 1.5 percent annually, but of the 160 critical defense industries, 94, or 59 percent, performed below that overall average. The defense industries with the greatest decline in capacity were aluminum rolling and drawing, steel foundries, industries, industrial trucks and tractors, and primary copper.

The GAO report also provided LMI's figures on the annual percentage change in manufacturers' shipments. These shipments are a measure of the activity in each defense critical industry. A negative or low growth demonstrates slow demand growth, which may lead to reduced investments and growth in capacity. The ball and roller bearing industry fell by 2.9 percent. Iron and steel forgings fell by 5 percent, and screw machine products increased only by 0.6 percent in comparison with the 1.4 percent per year growth of shipments for all manufacturing combined. There are other measures of industry health, such as investment ratios and average return on fixed assets, that also reveal similar deterioration.

Of equal importance is the deterioration of high-technology industries. The 1988 Defense Science Board study, "The Defense Industrial and Technology Base," states the premise:

> The effectiveness of our deterrent depends upon our ability to maintain this technological superiority and our adversaries' belief in that ability. When our ability is questioned, our deterrent is diminished and the threat of war increases.

Although we have managed to ensure our technological superiority since the Second World War, the margin of superiority has steadily declined. Even as I speak, the technological initiative is moving in the Soviets' favor among the 20 most important basic technology areas as defined by the Science Board study. Of the 15 areas in which the United States is superior, 8 are quickly approaching equality, while 3 of the 5 equal areas are becoming Soviet-dominant. Thus in 11 out of the 20 areas the Soviet Union is either taking the lead, as in optics and conventional warhead technology, or achieving parity, as in such fields as submarine detection, signature reduction, and aerospace propulsion.

Even as the United States loses its technological supremacy, it is losing control of its high tech industries. From 1981 to 1986, foreign acquisitions rose from about 35 American businesses to over 120 firms. In that total are represented 36 percent of the electrical and telecommunications industry, 20 percent of chemicals, pharmaceuticals and biotechnology companies, 16.2 percent of the computer industry, 13.3 percent of machine tool manufacturers, and 10.9 percent of precision instruments firms. In terms of military related industries, 11 companies were bought by foreigners in 1983 while there were 37 takeovers in 1988.

Right now there are even more acquisitions in process. A West German company is attempting to buy Electric Materials Co., possibly the only American producer of a silicon wafer that is required in advanced semiconductors. Plessy, a British company which bought American firms producing radar, communications systems, and antisubmarine devices but was under contractual agreements concerning classified work and technology export, is now the target of a $3 billion hostile takeover by General Electric of Britain and Siemens, a West German company. Should those succeed, all previous limitations may be irrelevant as far as the new owners are concerned.

Given this state of affairs, it is clear that something must be done, now. The Department of Defense has recognized this fact and has begun to take action to halt the erosion of our domestic defense industrial base. DOD has made efforts to assist selected sectors, particularly semiconductors, gas turbine engines, machine tools, ball bearing and forgings. Bolstering defense industrial competitiveness recommends establishing a manufacturing strategy committee to advise the Undersecretary of Defense for Acquisition on ways to improve the defense contractor manufacturing technology and industrial processes. Consistent with this objective, it lists several steps toward improving the planning and manufacturing capabilities of second-tier defense contractors. In particular, the report recognizes that subcontractor performance has had limited visibility in high-level DOD attention notwithstanding its clear importance in the procurement process:

> The Department of Defense procurement processes are focused on prime contractors, even though purchased materials and components supplied by subcontractors represent 50 to 85 percent of the total cost. The Department does not require or encourage vendors' participation in strategic planning decisions or design processes. In fact, requirements of the competition advocates for free and open price competition for subcontractors and suppliers have the effect of keeping the supplier base in constant turmoil and make it virtually impossible for defense contractors to build a stable base of reliable, high quality, cost-effective vendors. This is the opposite of the practice generally credited for the high quality of Japanese products.

Although the Department of Defense plans a number of programs to rectify the problems in the defense industrial base, I believe legislation is also needed to further advance and direct these efforts. My bill will encourage increased utilization of domestic firms in the performance of defense contracts by spurring prime defense contractors to consider domestic industry at the subcontractor level. The bill requires DOD to consider in its bid review process the amount of domestic subcontracting that prime contractors include in their bids.

This bill is modeled in part on Public Law 95-507, enacted in October 1978, which is intended to ensure that small businesses are given "the maximum practicable opportunity to participate" in Government contracts of prime contractors. The winner of a contract must meet with the procurement officer of the Government agency involved and work out an agreement which gives small business a certain percentage of all subcontracts.

Unfortunately, Public Law 95-507 has had a number of enforcement problems which my bill hopes to avoid. First, the Secretary of Defense will be required to publish and furnish an explanation of all laws, regulations and department policies which encourage the use of property manfuactured and services provided by domestic firms in performance of DOD contracts. Furthermore, the Secretary must publicize the availability of these materials.

The main thrust of the bill is designed to ensure American companies adequate access to government contracts. Each bid or proposal submitted by a contractor in connection with a contract solicitation issued by DOD shall specify the minimum percentage of the total dollar amount of the contract that is to be performed by domestic firms. The percentage amount of domestic subcontracting listed in the bid shall be a significant factor in the evaluation of the bid or proposal and the subsequent awarding of the prime contract. Therefore, those bids including a greater degree of domestic subcontracting content will be weighted favorably in comparison to bids containing a lesser content. Any contract awarded will include a requirement that at least the minimum percentage of domestic subcontracting promised in the bid will be commissioned.

In addition, the winning contractor is required to submit fully executed agreements with all subcontractors within 15 days of the award. Should the primary contractor decide to replace a subcontractor, a fully executed agreement with the replacement company is due within 15 days of notification to the Secretary. The Secretary will then review all contracts every 90 days to ensure that their provisions are being met.

The bill also has a clause to address complaints. If an interested party submits a complaint that a contractor has failed to comply with the contract's requirements, the Department's Inspector General must investigate. If the complaint is valid, the Department must require the contractor to take corrective action reasonably available or impose sanctions as determined by the Inspector General.

Mr. President, it is past time that Congress provide responsible incentives to insure increased participation by American industry in the defense procurement process and by doing so to maintain the integrity and viability of our defense industrial base. Failure to do that not only harms our national security, it destroys jobs and contributes to the further decline of our manufacturing sector. This legislation is a modest but constructive effort to remind everyone that Buy American is a pro-American policy. I do not mean this in the simple, dogmatic sense. Rather, it is founded upon a keen sense of reality. The United States is one of two superpowers. As such it has a number of inherent responsibilities. In order to fulfill these duties we need the ability to act independently of other nations, both out of choice and possibly necessity. Without a secure industrial base such independent action is impossible. It is therefore our task to ensure that the United States will never be compromised due to a simple lack of parts. Such an ignominious fate is so easily avoidable that it cannot be allowed to be our destiny.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of the bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 495

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SEC. 2. EFFECTIVE DATE

The amendments made by section 1 shall take effect with respect to contract solicitations issued by the Department of Defense on or after the date of the enactment of this Act.●

By Mr. BINGAMAN (for himself, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. BURDICK, and Mr. CONRAD):

S. 496. A bill to amend the Carl D. Perkins Vocational Education Act to establish a program of grants for vocational-technical training and to encourage tribal economic development, to provide for the designation of the National Indian Center for Research in Vocational-Technical Training, and for other purposes; to the Select Committee on Indian Affairs.

INDIAN VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

● Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I rise today to reintroduce legislation aimed at helping young native Americans better prepare themselves for the competitive, global society of the 21st century. Joining me in introducing this legislation are my good friends and distinguished colleagues, the chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Indian Affairs, Mr. INOUYE, Senator DOMENICI, Senator BURDICK, and Senator CONRAD.

This legislation will amend the Carl D. Perkins Vocational Education Act to ensure more native Americans of their right to a quality vocational education. Such an assurance is vitally important to the young Indian people of New Mexico and to native Americans throughout the country. The world these young people face, with its harsh economic realities, is a new and different place. It is not the world we knew as children.

In their world, the key to success is education.

Without a good, solid education, the youth of today will be unable to compete for the job of the 21st century. And without maximum participation by all of our citizens in the workforce, our Nation's social and economic structure will suffer untold damage. Indeed, many of our Indian tribes are already suffering. Some of the highest unemployment rates in the Nation are recorded on their lands, and some of the highest high school dropout rates are found among their youths.

Unfortunately, the Indian tribes of New Mexico know the pain of these statistics all too well. The Navajo Nation is plagued with an unemployment rate hovering near 40 percent. And last year in New Mexico, more than 10 percent of the native American teenagers enrolled in public schools dropped out. During the last several years, the State dropout rate has been highest among this group of students and the native American college-entrance rate remains woefully low.

These grim statistics must be turned around, and given the trust relationship between the Federal Government and Indian tribes, the Congress' responsibility should be obvious. Each Indian youth, no less than any other young person in this country, deserves the opportunity to achieve as much as he or she is able.

But the jobs awaiting these young people, unlike the industrial-based jobs common only a decade ago, often require highly specialized training. The training and education is hard to get, however, when it means leaving family, home, and culture for an unfamiliar, expensive, urban environment. I fear we are losing too many potential contributors to the national work force because too many young Indians simply cannot afford to leave the reservation and their families and homes. And the critically needed educational opportunities simply are not available on most reservations.

That is why this legislation is so important. It will establish a National American Indian Center for Research in Vocational-Technical Training to help tribes and tribal institutions formulate important economic development policies and strategies and develop critical education and training programs.

Importantly, it will also provide a basic funding source for tribal institutions nationwide, including the two institutions that are committed solely to providing quality vocational educational opportunities for Indian students—The Crownpoint Institute of Technology in New Mexico and the United Tribes Technical College in Bismarck, ND.

These are good schools, with important training opportunities in high-demand fields such as accounting, computer technology, health care, masonry, carpentry, and mechanics.

They also are schools operating on meager budgets, built largely by the Federal Government, but without Federal authorizing statutes to provide stable funding sources. The problems they must grapple with are many. Without dependable funding from the Federal or State Government, the schools exist year-by-year, competing for grants that get smaller and smaller each year. Long range planning is difficult, because their administrators often do not know whether they will be able to operate into the future. Critical structural repairs remain undone and course curriculum sometimes suffers.

Yet despite these adversities, these two schools are successes. Since first opening its doors in 1979, Crownpoint Institute of Technology has graduated more than 1,100 skilled workers into the Nation's work force. Nearly all of these graduates were unemployed and without job skills when they enrolled into Crownpoint.

Now, they have the education and training needed to leave the welfare rolls forever and assume active roles in their tribe's labor force and in our Nation's future.

Without a doubt, Crownpoint Institute of Technology and the United Tribes Technical College have played a crucial role in the education of many native Americans, and their intensive training programs should be encouraged and strengthened. This legislation does just that. It will provide a stable, basic funding source for these two schools based upon current expenditures and current costs. In addition, this legislation will establish a National Indian Center for Research in Vocational-Technical Training to help tribes and tribal institutions formulate important economic development policy and strategy.

This legislation is a critical component of a comprehensive educational system for native Americans and all Americans. It is not the complete solution to the many educational problems and pitfalls facing young Indians, but it is an important part of the solution. Accessible, affordable vocational education is critical to our future workforce, and our Indian people deserve the same basic opportunities available to others. We owe this to the young native Americans of today and tomorrow.●

By Mr. DECONCINI (for himself, Mr. SIMON, and Mr. HATCH):

S. 497. A bill entitled the "Copyright Remedy Clarification Act"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

COPYRIGHT REMEDY CLARIFICATION ACT

● Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce a bill with my colleagues Senator SIMON and Senator HATCH to reaffirm Congress' intent that States be subject to suit under the 1976 Copyright Act for copyright infringement. This bill has been made necessary by recent Federal Circuit Court opinions which, contrary to what I believe was the clear intent of the Congress when enacting the Copyright Act of 1976, have held that States are immune from suit in Federal court for infringement of copyright material. If these decisions are allowed to stand, without further congressional action, the intolerable result will be that States are entirely immune from prosecution for infringement under the comprehensive scheme of copyright protection the Congress provided in the Copyright Act. This lack of protection for American copyrighted material cannot be allowed to continue, and Congress must act now to restore to the law the degree of protection that has been thought to exist since Congress originally enacted the copyright law. The act must be amended to make clear that States are subject to suit in Federal district court for claims of copyright infringement.

On October 3, 1988, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit held that States and their instrumentalities are immune from damage suits for copyright infringement under the sovereign immunity clause of the 11th amendment to the U.S. Constitution. That decision, together with a recent similar holding in the fourth circuit, critically impairs creative incentive and business investments throughout this country's copyright industries—all of which serve important market segments which contain at least some State entities. Particularly vulnerable are the educational publishers among whose principal markets are State universities. The anomalous result of these decisions is that public universities can infringe without liability upon copyrighted material and essentially steal information from private universities, but private universities cannot similarly infringe with immunity on public institutions. In other words, UCLA can sue USC for copyright infringement, but USC cannot sue UCLA.

A State assertion of sovereign immunity in copyright claims has a particularly devastating effect on copyright owners who—unlike others foreclosed by 11th amendment immunity only from the Federal courts—are deprived of any forum for effective relief. Following the ninth circuit decision, the Register of Copyrights reported to Congress that "copyright proprietors have demonstrated that they will suffer immediate harm if they are unable to sue infringing States". The ninth circuit court itself concluded that:

Although we find the arguments [of plaintiff copyright owner and amici copyright industries] compelling, we are constrained by the Supreme Court's mandate that we find an abrogation of immunity only when Congress has included * * * unequivocal and specific language indicating an intent to subject States to suit in Federal court. Such language is absent from the Copyright Act of 1976. We recognize that our holding will allow States to violate the Federal copyright laws with virtual impunity. It is for the Congress, however, to remedy this problem.

Congressional reimposition of State liability for damage actions for copyright infringement is not a complicated matter and should not be a controversial one. The simple fact is that protecting copyright from this particular form of infringement does not render any conduct unlawful that is not already unlawful. it does not take away any "rights" from States that they now possess. It does provide fair opportunity for copyright owners to have their day in court, and it does provide relief for what is now and will remain infringing State conduct. Most importantly, congressional action to restore protection from infringement by States also serves to restore the careful, delicate balances struck by the 1976 Copyright Act—indeed, restoring this form of protection is essential to restoring that balance and perfecting the Congress' clear intent. As the Register of Copyrights recently concluded:

The legislative history of the Copyright Act demonstrates that, in enacting the 1976 copyright statute, Congress specifically focused debate on the extent to which the States and their agencies utilize copyrighted works and should either be liable for or exempt from infringement. * * * The Copyright Office is convinced that Congress intended to hold States responsible under the Federal copyright laws. * * * If the outcome of [the ninth circuit opinion] leaves open any possibility that States are immune from suits for damages in Federal courts for copyright infringement, Congress should act quickly to amend the act to ensure that States comply with the copyright law.

For nearly a decade following the 1976 Copyright Act, it was generally believed that States were not immune from copyright infringement suits. What the 101st Congress must do is what the 94th Congress thought it had done, only to find 9 years later that the Supreme Court had changed the legislative ground rules. Congress should now reaffirm its original intent in a manner consistent with the Supreme Court's recently announced guidelines and provide full protection for copyright owners, the very protection it thought it had provided in the 1976 act.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 497

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This act may be cited as the "Copyright Remedy Clarification Act".

SEC. 2. LIABILITY OF STATES AND INSTRUMENTALITIES OF STATES FOR INFRINGEMENT OF COPYRIGHT AND EXCLUSIVE RIGHTS IN MASK WORKS.

(a) COPYRIGHT INFRINGEMENT.—Section 501(a) of title 17, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following: "As used in this subsection, the term 'anyone' includes any State and any instrumentality of a State, both of which shall be subject to the provisions of this title in the same manner and to the same extent as any nongovernmental entity.".

(b) INFRINGEMENT OF EXCLUSIVE RIGHTS IN MASK WORKS.—Section 910(a) of title 17, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end the following: "As used in this subsection the term 'any person' includes any State and any instrumentality of a State, both of which shall be subject to the provisions of this title in the same manner and to the same extent as any nongovernmental entity.".

SEC. 3. EFFECTIVE DATE.

The amendments made by this Act shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act but shall not apply to any case filed before such date.●

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I am happy to join with my friend and colleague, Senator DECONCINI, as primary cosponsor, with Senator HATCH, of the Copyright Remedy Clarification Act. This bill is necessary to ensure that the intent of Congress in the 1976 Copyright Act is not undermined by recent court decisions; and that creators of American books, music, films, computer programs, and other works continue to have protection against illegal use of their copyrighted material.

Article 1 of the U.S. Constitution grants Congress the power—

[t]o promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for Limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective writings and Discoveries.

Accordingly, Congress has provided copyright protection to stimulate investment and creativity by promising copyright holders certain exclusive rights to their works.

The remedies for copyright infringement are exclusively in Federal courts. Some recent lower court decisions, however, have cast shadow of doubt on the ability of copyright holders to successfully seek damage against certain infringers. State entities may now hide behind the doctrine of sovereign immunity, which exempts them from damages in a copyright infringement suit.

This was clearly not the intent of Congress when it revised the Copyright Act in 1976. As noted in a study of this issue by the U.S. Copyright Office—

[t]he legislative history of the Copyright Act demonstrates that, in enacting the 1976 Copyright statute, Congress specifically focused debate on the extent to which states and their agencies utilize copyrighted works and should be either liable or exempt from infringement.

The Federal Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit, in the case BV Engineering versus University of California, decided in October 1988, rejected evidence of congressional intent. The court required "unequivocal and specific language indicating an intent to subject States to suit in Federal court." The Ninth Circuit then stated, "It is for the Congress * * * to remedy this problem."

In the Copyright Remedy Clarification Act, we accept the invitation of the ninth circuit. Our bill does not create new rights, or alter the delicate balance between the copyright holder and the public. It does not take away any of the exemptions for State use already provided in the Copyright Act. This legislation merely clarifies congressional intent that copyright owners have a remedy against State entities for damages when they illegally copy or distribute copyrighted works.

As an author and publisher, I know how important copyright protection is to creativity. And as a member of the Judiciary Committee, I am proud to cosponsor this legislation, and to work toward its enactment.●

By Mr. PELL (by request):

S. 498. A bill to establish programs for the professional development, recruitment, and training of elementary and secondary school teachers, to establish a national academy for teaching, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

TEACHERS' PROFESSIONAL DEVELOPMENT ACT

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, today I am reintroducing, by request, the Teacher's Professional Development Act of 1988. I am doing so on behalf of the Council of Great City Schools. The Council of the Great City Schools is a national organization comprised of 45 of the Nation's largest urban public school systems. These cities serve over 5 million students, or approximately 12 percent of the Nation's public school enrollment. Schools in these urban areas educate about one-third of the Nation's black children, 27 percent of the Nation's Hispanic children and 20 percent of the Nation's Asian children. Almost one-third of these children are from families receiving some form of public assistance.

Resources in these schools are woefully inadequate. While these schools face shortages of educational materials, equipment and facilities, the greatest resource deficiency is that of teacher supply. It is startling to realize that teacher shortages are four times higher in urban areas than other areas of the country. Many of the teachers currently practicing in these schools are due to retire, and urban schools have not been able to attract new teachers to fill this gap.

This is compounded by the fact that these schools face an even more severe shortage of minority teachers. Student enrollment in the Great City Schools is about 70 percent minority, 30 percent nonminority; yet the teaching force is almost the reverse: 68 percent nonminority, 32 percent minority.

Teacher recruitment is a serious problem for urban schools. It is not surprising that inadequate resources, higher student-teacher ratios, dangerous conditions and severe discipline problems turn teachers away from an urban assignment. Ironically enough, these schools need our best teachers, because for children in poverty, education remains the only viable ticket out of the ghetto.

The Teacher's Professional Development Act would provide financial assistance to local education agencies, colleges and universities, and individuals to develop programs to enhance the professional status of teachers; recruit and retain larger numbers of minority teachers; and provide inservice training and incentives which encourage teaching as a career goal. I am introducing this bill so that it may serve as a vehicle for discussion. It is one important example of an approach to the very difficult problem we face in the area of teacher shortages.

Later in this Congress, it is my intent to take a careful examination of the whole issue of teaching, from teacher recruitment to teacher retention. This proposal will most certainly be an integral part of that examination. I commend this legislation prepared by the Council of Great City Schools to my colleagues, and urge that they give it their most serious consideration.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. CRANSTON (for himself, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. MURKOWSKI, and Mr. DANFORTH):

S. 499. A bill to amend the National Security Act of 1947 to make the Secretary of Commerce a member of the National Security Council; to the Select Committee on Intelligence.

DESIGNATION OF SECRETARY OF COMMERCE AS A MEMBER OF THE NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I rise to introduce legislation to make the Secretary of Commerce a statutory member of the National Security Council. I do so in order to ensure that economic considerations are part of the national security advice given to the President. This bill is identical to legislation introduced in the House by my friend and fellow Californian, MEL LEVINE.

Mr. President, the world is a far more complex place today than it was when the NSC was created in 1947. It's time to recognize—in a formal way—that economic security is a fundamental and inseparable part of national security, and deserves the same respect given to military and foreign policy considerations. This legislation will aid us in our efforts to develop sound, coordinated policies that take into account our economic as well as our national security concerns.

As America prepares to enter the 21st century, the stakes are extraordinarily high. The internationalization of the world economy has changed the dimensions of national security. Foreign trade competition is greater now than at any other time in our history and shows no sign of abating. The developing economies of the Pacific rim are gaining economic power as they expand their level of exports to the United States and the rest of the world. We must acknowledge Japan as an economic giant and work to lower our massive trade deficit with her. Our Nation will also encounter a more concerted trade effort from our allies in Europe as the EC pushes to consolidate its markets by 1992.

If we continue to mount soaring trade deficits, we risk losing an entire generation of jobs and business opportunities. We risk weakening our economic institutions and industrial base. This, obviously, has implications for our national security. If America wishes to remain a world leader, we must meet these economic challenges. I believe we will be successful, but success will not come on its own. We must work creatively and tirelessly to regain our edge in international trade competition.

We must begin this process by rethinking the way in which our Nation formulates policy. We must recognize that our economic security is the foundation of our national security. Thus, one of our most important goals must be to ensure that economic concerns are fully considered in national security debates.

As part of the National Security Act of 1947, the National Security Council was created to "advise the President with respect to the integration of domestic, foreign, and military policies relating to national security." Statutory membership on the Council is limited to the President, Vice President, and the Secretaries of State and Defense. Because of the growing importance of economic policy issues to our national security, I believe the time has come to bring the Department of Commerce into the realm of national security decision making.

It is extremely important that we do not overlook the domestic element of the national security equation. Simply put, a sound economy is the foundation of our national security. Without economic strength and stability, the future well-being of our Nation is in jeopardy. This is why I support making the Secretary of Commerce a statutory member of the National Security Council.

National security concerns cannot be properly examined if looked at outside the context of economic considerations. Let me illustrate this point by discussing the issue of American high technology exports, an issue with considerable national security implications. The Department of Defense is greatly concerned about sensitive technology getting into the hands of Soviet bloc nations—and rightly so; such diversions would have severe military consequences for our Nation. However, the issue of technology exports cannot be examined solely in military terms. Exports of nonsensitive goods account for a sizable portion of our Nation's overall level of high-technology exports. Placing excessive controls on goods which are not "critical," or are readily available from other Western sources, undermines the competitiveness of our high technology industries, thus harming America's economic position.

Clearly, both Commerce and Defense have a role to play in developing policies such as those relating to export controls. I am concerned, however, that economic considerations are not always given the attention they deserve. It's crucial that we continue to foster a more cooperative effort on issues impacting our economic and national security.

The most recent manifestation of this is the handling of the Fighter Support Experimental [FSX] Agreement with Japan by the administration. Negotiations on this agreement—which would allow the United States to transfer fighter aircraft technology to Japan for codevelopment and coproduction, and in turn receive access to any new technology resulting from the project—were handled entirely by the Defense Department. It is only because of strong reservations expressed by Commerce Secretary Mosbacher, U.S. Trade Representative Hills, and Members of Congress that the administration delayed signing the agreement, thus allowing time for review by an interagency panel. This delay has given Commerce officials some time to assess the potential impact that this transfer of important technology could have on the long-term competitiveness of American industry. But, essentially, the agreement was complete before Commerce had any real opportunity to review the deal or to affect the specifics of the agreement. This should not happen.

Clearly, we must not treat our economic concerns so lightly. How we deal with our trading partners will largely determine the fate of the American economy and our role as a world power. We must ensure that the Commerce Department is an active player in all matters which involve our economic and national security concerns. The challenges presented to us by a changing world economy must be confronted by a unified American Government, with policies which reflect our Nation's best interests. We must coordinate our efforts better—nothing less than our future prosperity depends on it.

Mr. President, I am pleased to be joined in this bipartisan effort to reinforce our national security by my colleagues, Senators MURKOWSKI, BINGAMAN, and DANFORTH. It's my hope that other Senators will show their support by cosponsoring this legislation, and that this important measure will be enacted soon.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed at the conclusion of my statement.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 499

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 101(a) of the National Security Act of 1947 (50 U.S.C. 402(a)) is amended—

(1) in clause (6) of the fourth undesignated paragraph by striking "and";

(2) by redesignating clause (7) of that paragraph as clause (8); and

(3) by inserting after clause (6) of that paragraph the following:

"(7) the Secretary of Commerce; and".

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, I am pleased to be an original cosponsor of Senator CRANSTON's legislation to make the Secretary of Commerce a statutory member of the National Security Council. I commend him for introducing this long overdue legislation and I commend his colleague Congressman LEVINE for introducing identical legislation in the House.

It has been clear to me for some time that we need to broaden our traditional narrow definition of "national security" to include our economic and trade relations with other nations. As a member of the Armed Services Committee, I have seen these economic and trade issues become inextricably intertwined with our defense relations with our allies and foes alike. The most recent instance is the memorandum of understanding with Japan on the development of the FSX fighter. But I can think of numerous other instances in recent years where our Nation would have benefited from a closer linkage between our economic policies and our defense and foreign policies. Frankly, most other nations do a far better job in making this connection in their policy process.

I can think of no better way to further this purpose in our own policy making process than by placing the Secretary of Commerce on the National Security Council. I urge my colleagues to seriously consider this legislation and I hope that it will win broad support throughout the Congress.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, one of the most profound developments in a rapidly changing world is the growing linkage between commerce and national security.

General Secretary Gorbachev's far-reaching reform campaign is based on the urgent recognition that the Soviet Union is falling far behind other advanced industrial nations in economic performance. Despite its vast military power, the U.S.S.R. is in real danger of being relegated to the status of a second rate power as its economic limitations curtail its international influence and, ultimately, its military capability.

Global economic power has shifted sharply to the Far East. Japan has replaced the United States as the global banker. Korea, Taiwan, and other nations on the Pacific Rim are the world's fastest growing, most dynamic economies. Europe has made a dramatic bid to join them with the decision to create a true European Common Market in 1992. Meanwhile, the international economic position of the United States has eroded sharply as evidenced by persistent trade deficits and the reliance on foreign financing to support the Federal budget deficit.

The U.S. Government is not well organized to meet this increasingly demanding international economic competition. Formerly, this country had the luxury of ignoring the commercial implications of political and military decisions. No longer.

The recent United States-Japan proposed agreement on the FSX fighter aircraft is a case in point. Because the commercial implications of that proposed agreement were not taken fully into account by U.S. negotiators, we signed an agreement that is probably not as good as it could have been. Even if the agreement is an acceptable one, the process that produced it was clearly flawed. There are many other similar examples of the same problem.

I am pleased to join Senator CRANSTON in introducing legislation to insure that economic and commercial considerations be taken fully into account in national security decisionmaking. The proposed bill would add the Secretary of Commerce as a statutory member of the National Security Council. In my view, we should go a step further and extend the membership to include the U.S. Trade Representative, as well. When the bill comes to committee, I will propose a friendly amendment to that effect.

By Mr. McCONNELL:

S. 500. A bill to provide incentive grants to one elementary and two secondary schools of excellence in each congressional district, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

EXCELLENCE IN EDUCATION ACT

● Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce the Excellence in Education Act of 1989. This legislation, introduced in the 100th Congress as S. 1627, provides for the award of incentive grants to elementary and secondary schools which achieve the greatest improvement in academic achievement and attendance rate. This bill seeks to further assure both families as well as teachers that excellence in education remains a national, as well as State and local, priority.

As we look across the Nation, it is clear that the Nation's education report card is mixed at best. Reports of high educational achievement clash with other stories of frighteningly low educational attainment. For every bright star in the education sky, there is at least another dim point where education performance falters. I fear that, unless we take action as a nation to address our educational problems, the educational sky may dim altogether.

My own State of Kentucky exemplifies the educational challenge facing us. The Commonwealth of Kentucky has the lowest percentage of high school graduates in the country—only 53 percent of Kentucky's population 25 and older have high school degrees. In fact, 20 percent of Kentucky adults have less than an eighth grade education. The number of Kentucky adults age 15 to 44 who have even attended college lags 26 percent behind the national average. Perhaps even more frighteningly, Kentucky ranks at or near the bottom of the Nation in percentage of adult literacy.

As stark as this picture is, I don't mean to suggest that Kentucky is bereft of educational success. Kentucky students rank with their peers across the Nation in every field of study. The point I am trying to make is that we simply cannot continue to allow this to be a nation of educational haves and have-nots.

I don't profess to know all the answers to our Nation's educational needs. What I do know is that no one entity, Federal, State, or local, or public or private, has sufficient means to combat education's problems. Only through a renewed partnership of all available resources will we be able to address our Nation's education ills.

I propose that we address ourselves to the frontline of elementary and secondary school education: our teachers and principals. When all is said and done, and the dust from the pundits' various prescriptions settles, it is our educators who are charged with the responsibility of putting theory into practice. I think it's long past time that we recognized innovative educators for their success.

The Excellence in Education Act provides one elementary and two secondary schools in each congressional district with incentive grants of up to $50,000. These grants will be distributed to schools that show the largest improvement in academic performance and attendance, and will support both merit bonus awards as well as program and facility improvement.

Mr. President, I would like to assure my colleagues that my proposal is not "merit pay" as such. Adequacy of educators' salaries is an important and pressing issue, and should be addressed at the appropriate level. As my colleagues know, however, the Federal Government lacks the resources to step in and supplement State and local support for teachers and principals.

Like my previous bill, S. 1627, the Excellence in Education Incentive Act of 1987, my new bill provides incentive grants up to $50,000 for the one elementary school and the one secondary school in each congressional district which demonstrates the largest measure of improvement in academic performance and attendance rate. However, my bill will now also provide for incentives for secondary schools to address the Nation's grievous lack of ability in mathematics and science.

In a recent international comparison of math and science skill among 13-year-olds, American students wound up at or near the bottom of the survey. Bassam Z. Shakhashiri, Assistant Director for Science and Engineering Education at the National Science Foundation, said that "the lack of preparation for further education and future employment that these American teenagers demonstrated is nothing short of frightening." I certainly agree, Mr. President; at a time when the national and world markets are becoming more technologically oriented, we simply cannot afford to be left behind. Mr. President, earlier I alluded to the danger of becoming a nation of education haves and have-nots. We are also in imminent danger of becoming technological have-nots in the world's markets.

My proposal to award vital skills incentive grants to secondary schools which demonstrates the most improvement in mathematics and science skills will not solve this problem by itself. But it will provide incentives for educators to find innovative means of training tomorrow's mathematicians and scientists.

Upon award by the Secretary of Education, 75 percent of an education excellence incentive grant will go to merit bonuses to teachers and school principals. The remaining 25 percent may be used for academic programs, supplies, and equipment, or for the repair of academic facilities. Upon award of vital skills incentive grants, 70 percent of the grant will go to merit bonuses. The remaining 30 percent can be used for academic programs, supplies, and equipment, or for the repair of academic facilities. Neither and education excellence incentive grant nor a vital skills incentive grant will go to the same school in consecutive years.

Dispensation of the merit bonuses will be determined by Merit Selection Board composed of one member appointed by the Member of the House and one member appointed by each Senator of the State in which the district is located. The Board will use the following criteria when making individual awards: The teacher's attendance record, the attendance record of the students enrolled in the classes of the teacher, the academic achievement and improvement of the students enrolled in the classes taught by the teacher, innovative educational techniques, and leadership qualities of the principal.

Mr. President, by introducing the Excellence in Education Act of 1989, I hope to stimulate healthy competition in education techniques and ideas. I believe America's educators are the key to turning American education around, both in terms of application as well as the genesis of innovative new education ideas. I urge my colleagues to join me in providing America's educators with meaningful incentives to find new means of making education work.●

By Mr. D'AMATO (for himself, Mr. STEVENS, and Mr. DODD):

S. 501. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 to make permanent, and to increase the amount of, the exclusion for amounts received under qualified group legal services plans; to the Committee on Finance.

TAX TREATMENT OF AMOUNTS RECEIVED UNDER GROUP LEGAL SERVICES PLANS

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I am introducing today a measure that will foster the availability of legal services for everyday Americans. As it stands now, too many folks are locked out financially from most law offices. The American Bar Association [ABA] estimates that only 24 million Americans claim the financial ability to access legal counsel. Legal services must not be a luxury for the privileged few.

This bill would amend section 120 of the Internal Revenue Code to make permanent the exclusion from employee's gross income the amount employers contribute to prepaid group legal services which are provided employees as a work benefit. It would also raise from $70 to $90 the limit on annual premium payments which are excludable from gross income.

Making this exemption permanent will be a positive and substantial step forward in assuring that anyone who wants a lawyer can afford one.

Tax exclusion of group legal services is not a new provision. Employees have been allowed to exclude such benefits from their gross income since 1976. Initial enactment of this provision, however, was on a 5-year trial basis, which required Congress to revisit the issue in 1981 and three times thereafter. The most recent instance was in the 100th Congress. The Tax Technical Corrects Act included only a 1-year extension of this provision, thus necessitating this legislation.

Group legal services provide valuable and necessary assistance to millions of Americans. With the growing complexity of today's world, the need of ordinary citizens for legal counsel has become greater. Be it a real estate transaction, preparation of a will, or a simple divorce, Americans are frequently confronted with problems of a legal nature, which makes access to a lawyer indispensable. Group legal services are a low cost, effective source for legal counseling.

Mr. President, there is no reason why we should not make this tax exclusion a permanent part of the Tax Code. By making it permanent we remove the cloud hanging over the legal service industry and clear up the uncertainty about legal service tax treatment that now troubles plan participants. Indeed, certainty in this context is crucial. It is unfair to require providers and participants to guess whether Congress will extend the exclusion or not each time the provision is due to expire. Such unpredictability retards the growth and availability of group legal services and hampers financial planning.

As an institution, the Senate has repeatedly affirmed its commitment to assuring the availability of legal services by rebuffing efforts to scale back or eliminate the Legal Services Corporation [LSC]. Support for this measure and support for the LSC share a central premise—access to a lawyer is essential.

This measure enjoys the support of numerous business and labor organizations, in addition to the ABA.

I urge my colleagues, Mr. President, to join in our efforts to clarify once and for all the tax treatment of employer provided group legal services.●

By Mr. BAUCUS (for himself and Mr. BURNS):

S. 502. A bill to extend the application deadline for assistance under the Impact Aid Program; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

EXTENDING THE APPLICATION DEADLINE FOR ASSISTANCE UNDER THE IMPACT AID PROGRAM

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senator BURNS, I am introducing a bill today that will allow 14 school districts across the country to receive money to which they are entitled but have been denied due to bureaucratic rules that won't budge.

These school districts, including St. Ignatius in Montana, were late in filing their applications for Federal impact aid. Their penalty for being late was a flat denial of any aid at all. The Department of Education allows no grace period for these schools—aid is simply denied if the applications are not received by January 31. No excuses, no help, no money.

My legislation extends the application deadline from January 31, 1989, to March 15 of this year. Applications received by the Department by March 15 will be considered valid and eligible for funding.

The Impact Aid Program is an entitlement—there is no competition for funding. Because of this, my bill costs the Government nothing. The money has already been appropriated and should be given to all the schools that are eligible for it.

St. Ignatius is located on the Flathead Indian Reservation and has a population of 822. Six hundred of those people are between the ages of 5 and 18. The district is eligible to receive $400,000 in impact aid, about one-quarter of the school district budget. Without the aid, the district will probably be forced to lay off teachers, cut back on services, and the schools may risk losing their accreditation.

Today, school superintendents have their hands full in ensuring that students receive a good education within the severe budget constraints facing our schools. The St. Ignatius school superintendent is new this year and has been responsible for not only learning about his district but the many Federal rules and regulations governing education. A formidable task for anyone.

He made an honest mistake—he thought the application had to go to the State educational agency by January 31, not the Federal Government. He mailed his application by the January 31 deadline and the State agency sent it on to Washington. The Department of Education received it on February 13—9 working days after the deadline—but denied it because it was late.

Now, 600 students don't know if they'll be going to schools that are accredited. Teachers don't know if they'll have jobs and the rest of the town is wondering how the Department of Education can be so insensitive to their needs. I wonder about that, too.

The per capita income of St. Ignatius is $5,260. They can't come up with $400,000 to keep their schools going. And they shouldn't have to. They are entitled to this money and should receive it.

We've heard a lot about a kinder and gentler Nation and the importance of education. It's time that we follow through on these ideas. I understand that the Department needs to set deadlines, but I also understand the plight of 600 children who want to go to school.

The Department of Education is in the process of reviewing these regulations and may change them in the future. But St. Ignatius can't afford to wait. I ask the Senate to consider the future of these students and extend the application deadline. We can't let the bureaucracy get in the way of education.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy fo the bill be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 502

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of Education shall consider as timely filed, and shall process for payment, an application from a local educational agency for fiscal year 1989 funds under section 2 or 3 of the Act entitled "An Act to provide financial assistance for local educational agencies in areas affected by Federal activities, and for other purposes", approved September 30, 1950 (20 U.S.C. 240) (hereinafter referred to as the "Act"), if such application has been certified by the State educational agency, was received by the Secretary of Education by March 15, 1989, and is otherwise in compliance with the provisions of the Act.●

By Mr. BAUCUS (for himself and Mr. CHAFEE):

S. 503. A bill to protect the ozone layer by reducing chlorofluorocarbons and halons, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

CHLOROFLUOROCARBONS AND HALON REDUCTION ACT

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation along with Senator CHAFEE to preserve the Earth's protective ozone shield and reduce threats to the Earth's climate.

Two chemicals, chlorofluorocarbons and halons, are largely responsible for reducing the protective ozone layer in the Earth's upper atmosphere. This legislation will ensure that manufacturers of these chemicals will quickly and smoothly develop and use safe substitutes that will not destroy our ozone layer.

Without a protective ozone layer, harmful ultraviolet radiation will reach the Earth's surface, increasing the chance of skin cancer, threatening our body's immune system and damaging the Earth's ecosystems.

In the Earth's lower atmosphere, these two chemicals are potent greenhouse gases. They account for 15 to 20 percent of all greenhouse gases worldwide, and are believed to be changing our global climate.

The danger from releasing these chemicals into the environment is getting worse with every passing day. Almost every day we learn more about the effects from halons and CFC's. We now have data linking the destruction of the ozone to these chemicals. The data suggests that it is no longer a question "if" a hole in the ozone layer exists, but how large it is.

We must prohibit the use of ozone depleting substances, before there is no more ozone to deplete. Like in baseball, three strikes and you're out. Halons and CFC's now have three strikes. The evidence is overwhelming.

In 1987, a study of the Antarctica atmosphere found that CFC's and halons caused a hole in the ozone layer over that continent. This is strike one.

Next a group of experts collected data showing that a significant loss of ozone has occurred during the winter months, not only over the polar caps, but worldwide. Strike two.

Finally last week the National Aeronautics and Space Administration [NASA] and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration [NOAA] released evidence that the ozone layer is being threatened in the Arctic.

The entire Arctic stratosphere is being changed, for the worse, apparently by the presence of chlorofluorocarbons and halons.

In my opinion this is strike three.

Together, the findings over the years clearly make the case that the time for action is now.

The Montreal Protocol, a monumental agreement and system of international cooperation went into effect on January 1 of this year.

This protocol freezes worldwide production of CFC's at 1986 levels for the 31 countries that have signed the protocol.

It also reduces CFC production first by 20 percent and then by 50 percent by the year 1998.

The Montreal Protocol represents a tremendous hope for the world's environment. It is a sign that countries can cooperate to address global environmental problems.

Unfortunately, it was negotiated before we knew that CFC's were responsible for the Antarctic hole; before we knew that stratospheric ozone had been depleted worldwide; and before we knew that a hole similar to the one over the Antarctic also exists over the Arctic.

If the Montreal Protocol is implemented as it stands today, chlorine levels will continue to increase and will double by the middle of the next century. The stratospheric ozone layer could not tolerate such high levels.

We must use our latest data and move forward from the Montreal Protocol. The legislation that we are introducing today is meant to do just that.

The Chlorofluorocarbon and Halon Reduction Act establishes a freeze on the production of ozone depleting substances.

The bill sets a fee on each pound of CFC or halon produced, based upon its ozone depleting potential. The fee should eliminate any incentives to continue producing these substances while they are being controlled and reduced.

The fee is set at 25 cents per pound and is increased until it reaches $2.50 per pound in 1994. The revenue will be transferred from the producers of CFC's and halons to the U.S. Treasury.

The bill also sets up an ozone layer and climate protection trust fund to provide grants to producers and users of ozone depleting substances to develop safe substitutes.

Today, I am also joining Senator CHAFEE in introducing legislation to phaseout the use of CFC's, and halons. The evidence clearly supports the need to cut the production of these substances by more than 50 percent, the amount specified in the Montreal Protocol.

Finally, in the near future, I will introduce comprehensive legislation addressing all ozone depleting substances and greenhouse gases.

This legislation, together with the bills we are introducing today, will provide EPA with all the tools necessary to protect our global environment from ozone depleting substances and greenhouse gases.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill and a section-by-section analysis of the bill be printed in the RECORD and that the executive summary of the findings of the Airborne Artic Stratospheric Expedition be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 503

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Chlorofluorocarbons and Halon Reduction Act of 1989".

FINDINGS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) restrictions on the production of chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) and halons are essential to safeguarding the earth's ozone layer, reducing the greenhouse effect, and protecting human health and the environment;

(2) restrictions on chlorofluorocarbons and halon production, as required under the Montreal Protocol on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer and by Environmental Protection Agency regulations, will restrict the supply and therefore increase the price of these chemicals, and that increased prices provide a greater economic incentive for firms using these chemicals to increase recycling, while also providing an incentive for the introduction of chlorofluorocarbons and halon substitute chemicals;

(3) future revenues from higher chlorofluorocarbons and halon prices, resulting from regulatory restrictions to protect human health and the environment, should be used for the benefit of the public. As such, some portion of these revenues should be made available in an equitable manner to facilitate and expedite the shift away from the harmful chlorofluorocarbons and halons by chlorofluorocarbons and halon producer and user firms;

(4) because of the worldwide recognition of the need to move away from using ozone-depleting chemicals, strong international competition now exists to develop chemical substitutes and to produce chlorofluorocarbons- and halon-free products including refrigerators, electronic components, various foams, and automobile and commercial air conditioners. United States chemical producers and chlorofluorocarbons and halon user industries should be encouraged to successfully participate in this competition by developing improved chemicals and products that do not rely on chlorofluorocarbons and halons; and

(5) special emphasis should be placed on developing new chlorofluorocarbons- and halon-free products and technologies with improved energy efficiency as a means of protecting the ozone layer and contributing to reductions in global warming.

OBJECTIVES AND NATIONAL GOAL

SEC. 3. (a) The objective of this Act is to provide for a smooth transition away from the use of ozone-depleting chemicals in order to protect the earth's ozone layer and to limit global warming.

(b) In order to achieve that objective, the national goal is to provide for an orderly and equitable shift to alternative chemicals and products and to facilitate the competitiveness of United States industry at home and abroad.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 4. As used in this Act, the term—

(1) "Administrator" means the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency;

(2) "assessment year" means the 12-month period as set forth in section 6(a) or as hereafter modified pursuant to this Act; and

(3) "ozone-depleting chemicals" refers to those chemicals listed in section 5(a) as may be modified by section 5(b).

(4) "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Treasury.

IMPOSITION OF PRODUCTION AND IMPORTATION CHARGE ON OZONE-DEPLETING CHEMICALS

SEC. 5. (a)(i) Within 60 days following the date of the enactment of this Act, the Administrator shall issue such regulations as may be necessary, commencing with the effective date provided by the following table, to impose an ozone-protection charge on producers and importers of the following chemicals:

Ozone-Depleting Chemical	Effective Date
Trichlorofluoromethane (CFC-11).	July 1, 1989;
Dichlorodifluoromethane (CFC-12).	July 1, 1989;
Trichlorotrifluoroethane (CFC-113).	July 1, 1989;
Dichlorotetrafluoroethane (CFC-114).	July 1, 1989;
(Mono) chloropentafluoroethane (CFC-115).	July 1, 1989;
Bromochlorodifluoroethane (Halon 1211).	January 1, 1992;
Bromotrifluorethane (Halon 1301).	January 1, 1992; and
Dibromotetrafluoroethane (Halon 2402).	January 1, 1992.

(ii) Within 60 days following the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall issue such regulations to collect the production clause.

(b) The Administrator shall promulgate regulations adding to the list of ozone-depleting chemicals referred in to subsection (a), chemicals which are known or can reasonably be anticipated to cause or contribute to stratospheric ozone depletion and whose production and importation he determines should be limited to protect public health and the environment. The Administrator shall also promulgate changes to the effective dates in subsection (a) if such changes are necessary to protect public health and the environment and are in furtherance of the goal and objective of this Act set forth in section 3.

(c) In promulgating such regulations, the Administrator shall take such action as may be necessary to assure that no production or importation charge shall be imposed on any such chemicals that are used and entirely consumed in the production of other chemicals.

SETTING THE AMOUNT OF THE CHARGE

SEC. 6. (a)(1) For each assessment year, the production charge shall be estimated using the procedures set forth in this section. The production charge for each assessment period will be the greater of the amounts calculated under this subsection or subsection (b).

(2) The amount of the production charge shall be calculated on the basis of the following schedule:

(A) Chlorofluorocarbons—

Assessment Period	Amount of Base Charge
July 1, 1989 to Sept. 30, 1989.	$.25/pound
Oct. 1, 1989 to Sept. 30, 1990.	$.50/pound
Oct. 1, 1990 to Sept. 30, 1991.	$1.00/pound
Oct. 1, 1991 to Sept. 30, 1992.	$1.50/pound
Oct. 1, 1992 to Sept. 30, 1993.	$2.00/pound
Oct. 1, 1993 to Sept. 30, 1994.	$2.50/pound

and for every 12 month period thereafter $2.50/pound.

(B) Halons—

Assessment Period	Amount of Base Charge
Jan. 1, 1992 to Sept. 30, 1992.	$1.50/pound
Oct. 1, 1992 to Sept. 30, 1993.	$1.50/pound

and for every twelve month period thereafter $1.50/pound.

(3) The Administrator shall promulgate regulations modifying the assessment periods consistent with any changes to the effective dates adopted under section 5(b).

(4) The Administrator shall promulgate regulations modifying the amount of the base charge to reflect future changes in the expected price and availability of substitutes and alternative technologies to ozone-depleting chemicals.

(5) The base charge shall be assessed against each pound (or portion thereof) of ozone-depleting chemical produced or imported multiplied by that chemical's ozone-depletion factor. The ozone-depletion factors for the covered chemicals are the following:

Ozone-Depleting Chemical	Ozone Depletion Factor
CFC-11	1.0
CFC-12	1.0
CFC-113	0.8
CFC-114	1.0
CFC-115	0.6
Halon 1211	3.0
Halon 1301	10.0
Halon 2402	6.0

(b)(1) The Administrator shall promulgate regulations modifying the factors or adding to the list in subsection (a) consistent with actions under section 5(b).

(2) The charge shall be based on the calculated increase in revenues that result from the restrictions on the ozone-depleting chemicals in an assessment period. The charge shall be calculated by the Administrator as the total revenues from the sale of the ozone-depleting chemicals minus the estimated costs of production and reasonable rate of return.

(3) Total revenues shall be determined by the Administrator based on reports required by the Administrator, by regulation, from each firm producing ozone-depletion chemicals for that assessment year. The reports shall include the total revenues from sales of ozone-depleting chemicals broken down by chemical. The reports shall be received by the Administrator within 30 days of the end of an assessment period.

(4) Costs of production and reasonable rate of return shall be calculated by the Administrator as the 1986 weighted average price calculated separately for chlorofluorocarbons and for halons. To reflect future changes in production costs, the 1986 estimated weighted average price shall be multiplied each year by the producer price index for basic inorganic chemicals (published by the Department of Labor) for the period covered by that assessment year.

(5) Regulations by the Administrator shall permit individual companies to petition the Administrator with documentation showing that their production costs have increased more than the industry average. The Administrator shall modify the application of the calculation of production costs if a valid showing is made.

(6) The charge for importing ozone-depleting chemicals identified in section 5(a) shall be the same charge as calculated for the production of those same chemicals in the applicable assessment period. The charge shall be assessed against the importer of record as listed on United States Customs Service Form 7501.

(7) The Administrator shall notify producers and importers of the amount of their totaled assessed charge within 60 days of the end of the assessment period. Firms have within 30 days of the date of receipt of their assessment to submit full payment to the Secretary.

(8) Firms exporting ozone-depleting substances shall apply to the Administrator for refunds for the calculated charge for the quantity of ozone-depleting chemicals that they exported in each assessment period. Applications for refunds must be submitted to the Administrator for approval within 30 days of the end of the applicable assessment period. The Administrator shall review the request for a refund and notify both the requestor and the Treasury within 60 days of its approval of such requests. Approved requests for refunds shall be paid by the Secretary.

SUPPORT FOR RESEARCH RELATED TO TECHNOLOGICAL ALTERNATIVES TO OZONE-DEPLETING CHEMICALS

SEC. 7. (a) All moneys received by the Secretary pursuant to this Act for any assessment year, up to $100 million, shall be deposited in the Ozone Layer and Climate Protection Trust Fund established by section 10 of this Act. All moneys so received in any assessment year in addition to such $100 million shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

(b)(1) Moneys in the Trust Fund shall be available for research grants as follows:

(A) 30 percent to support research related to substitutes for ozone-depleting chemicals by chemical producers; and

(B) 70 percent to support research into alternative products that are produced without ozone-depleting chemicals covered by this Act.

(2) The research referred to in paragraph (1) shall include testing the basic properties of chemical substitutes; testing the applicability of possible substitutes in specific products; examining health, environmental, and safety issues related to the use of possible chemical substitutes; improving the energy efficiency of alternative technologies; monitoring environmental impacts; and other related purposes.

ADVISORY COMMITTEE

SEC. 8. (a) The Administrator shall establish an advisory committee to advise him in connection with research to be carried out pursuant to this Act. Such committee shall be comprised of individuals who are representatives of chlorofluorocarbons and halon producers and users, the Department of Defense (designated by and with the approval of the Secretary of Defense), the Department of Commerce (designated by and with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce), and public interest groups. Members of the Committee will serve without additional pay as such.

(b) It shall be the function of the advisory committee, at the request of the Administrator, to advise and make recommendations to the Administrator as to research to be carried out pursuant to this Act, and the making of grants to carry out such research.

(c) In carrying out its function, the advisory committee shall consider, among other things, the quantities of ozone-depleting chemicals the proposed technology would replace; the timing of possible reductions with preference given to near-term technologies; the effect of global climate change; the likelihood of commercialization of the technology; the degree of public and private participation and support for a proposed project; the extent to which the research results of the project will be accessible to the public; and the energy efficiency that would result from the project.

GRANTS

SEC. 9. (a) The Administrator is authorized to establish and carry out a grant program for the purpose of carrying out research authorized by this Act. Grants made under such program may be made to public and private entities, or combinations thereof, including consortia established expressly for the purpose of conducting research pursuant to this Act.

(b) Applications for grants under this Act shall be submitted as such time and in such form and contain such information as the Administrator shall prescribe by regulation.

TRUST FUND

SEC. 10. (a) There is established in the Treasury of the United States a trust fund to be known as the "Ozone Layer and Climate Protection Trust Fund" (referred to in this Act as the "Trust Fund"). The Trust Fund shall consist of such amounts as may be deposited in it as provided in this Act.

(b) Amounts in the Trust Fund shall be available, as provided by appropriation Acts, to carry out the grant program under this Act.

(c) It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to report to the Congress each year on the financial condition and the results of the operation of the Trust Fund during the preceding fiscal year and on its expected condition and operations during the next 5 fiscal years.

(f)(1) It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to invest such portion of the Trust Fund as is not, in his judgment, required to meet current withdrawals. Such investments may be made only in interest-bearing obligations of the United States. For such purpose, such obligations may be acquired—

(A) as original issue at the issue price, or

(B) by purchase of outstanding obligations at the market price.

(2) Any obligation acquired by such Trust Funds may be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury at market price. The interest on, and the proceeds from the sale or redemption of, such obligation held in such Trust Fund shall be credited to and become a part of the Trust Fund.

AUTHORIZATIONS

SEC. 11. There are authorized to be appropriated from the Ozone Layer and Climate Protection Trust Fund such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the grant program under this Act.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS—CFC AND HALON REDUCTION ACT OF 1989

Section 1: Short title.

Section 2. Congressional Findings. Includes findings that action to restrict chlorofluorocarbons (CFCs) and halons have recently been initiated through an international agreement (the Montreal Protocol) and carried out domestically by regulations adopted by EPA. By restricting the production of CFCs and halons, these regulations should increase the price of these chemicals. Higher CFC and halon prices serve the useful purpose of providing a strong economic incentive for increased recycling, while also creating a market for higher priced substitute chemicals and products.

EPA estimates that increased prices will generate several billion dollars in revenues over the next decade. Under the current EPA regulations, these revenues would accrue primarily to a small number of EPA and halon producers. The findings state that, instead of benefiting these few companies, this revenue should benefit the general public and that some portion of it should be made available on a more equitable basis to both CFC and halon producer and user firms to facilitate the transition away from the use of ozone-depleting chemicals.

The findings also note the widespread acceptance that CFCs and halons must be restricted, has lead to intense international competition to develop CFC- and halon-free technologies in such product areas as refrigeration, solvents, commercial and auto air conditioning and various foams. The firms that develop and bring such products to market will have an excellent opportunity to expand their domestic and international sales. Other nations are providing targeted support to assist their industries in making this transition. The findings suggest that some portion of the revenue that results from CFC and halon restrictions should be channelled back to United States chemical producers and user firms to aid them in their efforts to develop and bring to market alternative technologies.

The findings also note that special emphasis should be placed on developing alternative technologies that both are CFC and halon-free and which increase energy conservation. This final consideration is necessary to avoid shifting in the near term to technologies which could add to energy demand and therefore contribute to global warming. Such shifts could result in the need for costly, longer-term shifts to still different technologies to address concerns of global warming.

Section 3. Objectives and National Goal. Establishes as the objectives to provide for a smooth transition away from the use of ozone-depleting chemicals by facilitating the shift by United States producer and user industries to alternative chemicals and products for both domestic and international markets.

Section 4. Definitions. Specifies that the chemicals covered by and the timing of the charge are fully consistent with the Montreal Protocol and EPA's current regulation.

Section 5. Imposition of Production and Importation Charges. Specifies that the CFC and halon production charge shall be based on either a set fee schedule included in the Act or on the actual price increases, whichever is greater. The set fee schedule is based on a smooth transition to more costly CFC substitutes. It assumes that CFC substitutes will become commercially available by 1994 and will cost less than $2.50/pound more than current CFC prices. This method of setting the charge is fully consistent with anticipated pricing behavior by CFC producers under the current EPA regulation.

The alternative method would be used if CFC price increases were greater than anticipated under the first method. Under this approach, the total revenues from CFC and halon sales as determined by the market prices charged by the producers would be reported to EPA. The EPA Administrator would estimate changes in production costs based on 1986 base year prices increased by a producer price index to reflect inflation. This estimate would also ensure that producers maintained the same rate of return they received in 1986. For a given assessment period, the charge would be the difference between the actual total revenues from the sale of CFC and halons minus the adjusted production costs.

The import charges would be based on the average production charge for the same assessment period and would therefore remove any economic incentive for imports over domestic production. Charges on exports of the regulated chemicals would be refunded to avoid penalizing U.S. competitiveness abroad.

Section 7. Support for Research Related to Technological Alternatives to Ozone-Depleting Chemicals.

It sets forth a process and criteria for making some of the revenues collected by the charge available to CFC and halon producers and user industries to assist them in the transition way from these chemicals. It establishes an Ozone Layer and Climate Protection Fund in the Treasury and an advisory committee chaired by EPA and consisting of representatives of all the key industry sectors and government agencies to assist in determining the distribution of funds.

It authorizes up to [$75-100] million annually for five years and specifies that no more than [30-50] percent shall be made available to firms for the purposes of research into the development or production of chemical substitutes with the remainder targeted for user industries.

The section also describes that the funds are to be used for the purposes of research related to testing the basic properties and user applicability of proposed alternatives and for evaluating issues related to health, environment, and safety impacts. It establishes a number of criteria for distributing funds including: the quantity of CFCs and halons likely to increase energy efficiency; the degree of and support public and private participation; and the extent to which findings will be made available to the public. It is likely that many of these projects will build on existing joint research efforts that have been recently initiated in several sectors of the CFC and halon production and user industries.●

By Mr. GRAHAM (for himself, Mr. KERRY, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. DURENBERGER, and Mr. SANFORD):

S. 504. A bill to improve the operation of the Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

CARIBBEAN BASIN ECONOMIC RECOVERY ACT AMENDMENTS

● Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I am pleased to introduce today, along with my distinguished colleagues Senators KERRY, MCCAIN, DURENBERGER, and SANFORD, legislation which will improve the Caribbean Basin Initiative which the Congress originally approved in 1983.

Our reasons for improving the CBI are twofold and related. First, a broad range of U.S. national security interests is being directly threatened by continuing economic deterioration in Central America and the Caribbean.

Nowhere can this be seen more clearly than in the massive flow of narcotics into this country. Traffickers are having a field-day feeding on the economic despair that grips the region.

Second, the CBI works. An already deteriorating economic situation would have been worse without the CBI. A number of studies, including two by the International Trade Commission, prove that.

This legislation would make an already successful program even more effective by providing expanded duty-free access for CBI exports into the U.S. market.

In doing so, we have made every effort to protect the legitimate interests of U.S. industry. Indeed, this bill reflects in depth consultation with both domestic industry and governments in the region.

The result strengthens the CBI Program, while striking an appropriate balance between the needs of our democratic allies and our own domestic economic interests.

Although the CBI is by no means the sole resolution to the many complex problems facing the region, it is logically a necessary component of any comprehensive policy. We must revitalize economic growth in the basin so that our democratic friends can earn their way back to economic health.

Part of that process is the importance of long-term assurances for investors. Permanent economic health in the Caribbean Basin must be a U.S. objective that transcends the temporal limits of administrations and congressional sessions.

This legislation, in effect, makes the considerations in the Caribbean Basin Initiative permanent, subject to periodic review for effectiveness. It underlines our serious commitment to the goal of a prosperous and peaceful hemisphere.

We also extend a sensitivity to the unique nature of the small economies involved in the CBI by separating their exports from large-scale trade violations cases—separate injury cumulation determination. That makes sense and is the only fair way to judge those cases.

Yesterday, I spoke in support of renewing humanitarian aid for the Nicaraguan resistance. The ultimate aim of that gesture is to ensure that the peace process is strongly influenced to its full evolution in Central America—in the Caribbean nations there—by eliminating the extreme political dissension which subverts economic growth in the region. Democracy is a crucial component of stable economic progress and when we encourage one—we enhance the other.

Clearly we need a comprehensive, long range, pragmatic strategy for the hemisphere which paints the Caribbean Basin as a vigorous and enthusiastic partner in hemispheric progress. I think improving the CBI helps us to accomplish that goal.●

Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I rise today as an original cosponsor of S. 504, the Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act of 1989. I want to express my appreciation to Senator GRAHAM for his hard work on behalf of our hemispheric allies. I am honored to join him and my colleagues—Senators KERRY, MCCAIN, and SANFORD—in support of "CBI II."

I supported the original CBI legislation in 1983 because I believed it was an important step toward long-term economic growth in the Caribbean Basin. The 1983 bill granted duty-free status to many products for 12 years, contained tax incentives for investment and tourism, and provided guaranteed access levels for textile exports. However, no single piece of legislation could be expected to overcome the effects of oil price increases, the foreign debt burden or a host of other obstacles to development.

The reality is that CBI has worked well; although it has not revitalized the Caribbean economies, it has prevented a poor economic situation from becoming worse. Our democratic neighbors have a long way to go on the road to sustainable economic development. But CBI has provided valuable assistance on this road.

The benefits of CBI I are tangible: More than 600 investment projects have begun; more than $1.6 billion has been invested; 95,000 new full-time jobs, and 21,000 part-time jobs have been created; and nontraditional exports—the key to economic diversification—have registered major increases since 1983.

Despite these positive indicators, CBI has not met expectations—in part because expectations may have been too high, and in part because some CBI benefits accrue over the long term. There is a very real danger of losing the momentum that led to CBI I. It was the personal commitment of President Reagan that made CBI possible. A personal commitment from President Bush will be needed to breathe life into CBI II.

Unfortunately, the focus of United States Latin America policy in the 1980's has been almost exclusively dominated by Nicaragua. We have spent billions on Central America—and included the democracies of Central America as CBI beneficiaries—but we tend to overlook nations not beset with immediate evils or polarization and violence.

Belize does not get much attention in the United States because it does not have an active insurgency or a government perceived to be repressive. Belize is a vibrant democratic nation that needs only modest attention and commitment from the United States to aid its long-term development. CBI has been very important in opening new investment opportunities in Central America's newest nation and CBI II will provide more help.

We all knew where Grenada was after United States troops liberated the island—but how many Americans know what is going on there today? Or what is going on in St. Lucia? Trinidad and Tobago?

My point, Mr. President, is that we should not—and cannot—wait for unrest to make a country dominate our headlines. We can—and must—act constructively before instability reaches critical mass. A vital element is to provide CBI nations with the means to help themselves. Stimulating investment and production among our closest neighbors allows our democratic allies to foster economic growth and development.

I listened to Guatemalan President Vinicio Cerezo last night say that his country does not need gifts—it only needs a chance to develop its potential. I was in Guatemala last month and saw first hand the changes that President Cerezo's democratic rule has brought his country. I saw how nontraditional agriculture was growing—reducing dependence on world coffee and sugar prices.

I saw the manufacturing industry was having a fundamental impact on Guatemalan society. Manufacturers need consumers with buying power—and they pay higher wages. Newer manufacturing enterprises are now powerful competitors for labor with the traditional agricultural sectors. This competition for labor has made labor—for the first time in Guatemalan history—a commodity with real and growing value.

Guatemala's progress cannot be traced solely to CBI—the bravery and perseverence of a Cerezo and the vision of Defense Minister Gramajo deserve far more credit. Nonetheless, CBI has been an important element in progress toward democratization in Guatemala.

The bill introduced today would expand CBI in several critical areas. The Caribbean Basin Economic Recovery Act of 1989: Extends the duty-free treatment indefinitely; increases duty-free allowances for Americans traveling to CBI states; expands the duty-free treatment to more products; codifies the GAL for certain textile products; establishes a floor for sugar import quotas; lays out a separate injury determination formula in certain trade cases; and establishes a pilot program to help expedite customs clearance.

Mr. President, it is important to emphasize that these measures are only steps to help provide interim relief to the debt-ridden economies of the region. It is also important to let the CBI nations know our commitment to democracy and development is followed with concrete action. But it should not be viewed as a panacea for the economic difficulties facing the region. The long-term answers to the development question will continue to lie in infrastructure investment, diversification of the economic base and national policies that further economic growth.

As part of our commitment to the people of this region, we are establishing a minimum quota floor for sugar imports from this area. But the countries that will benefit from this quota must recognize that they cannot count on sugar exports to the United States as the foundation for their future economic development. As our domestic sugar producers become more efficient and productive, America's need for imported sugar will continue to decline. And while in the short term this legislation will insulate the CBI countries from such diminished imports, in the long term they must seek out other markets and other products for their export growth.

In their attempt to attract foreign investment and to diversify their economic base, the Caribbean countries must also recognize that they cannot look solely to the United States for a market. Japan, the Pacific rim countries, and Western Europe must all make a more concerted effort to open their markets to the products produced in this region—and to take a greater interest in the long-term development of the region. In this regard, I am heartened by the report of the International Commission for Central America—the Sanford Commission—which recognizes that multilateral action by all the world's democracies is an integral part of the solution for Central America.

Finally, this legislation should not be viewed by our major trading partners as an invitation to circumvent our antidumping and countervailing duty laws by allowing them to establish screwdriver plants in the CBI or build other facilities designed to circumvent dumping and countervail orders. The CBI injury cumulation provisions must be narrowly construed to ensure conformity with our other trade laws, and with our commitments and obligations under the GATT.

These reservations do not in any way diminish my support for this legislation. I have a strong commitment to work with my colleagues on the Senate Finance Committee make this bill into law.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

J.W. AND JOHN F. WOLFE HONORED IN COLUMBUS, OH

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I rise today to recognize two distinguished citizens of Columbus, OH, who have been chosen to receive the prestigious People of Vision Award of the Ohio affiliate of the National Society to Prevent Blindness.

J.W. Wolfe, chairman of the board of the Ohio Co., and John F. Wolfe, publisher, president, and the chief executive officer of the Columbus Dispatch, have demonstrated uncommon clarity of vision in their leadership in the Ohio business community and in their dedication to preventing blindness and promoting eye safety. Over the years they have each made many personal and professional humanitarian contributions to the cause of good vision, workplace safety and medical research, yet they have shunned publicity and refused awards that would have focused on themselves rather than on the benefits to the people of their community.

It is altogether fitting that these outstanding Ohioans be recognized for their visions of the future and their service to their neighbors. I am pround to salute John F. Wolfe and J.W. Wolfe of Columbus, OH, truly men of great vision, as they receive the 1989 People of Vision Award.●

DR. KENNETH O'BRIEN

● Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I rise today to speak in honor of Dr. Kenneth O'Brien, a man who has dedicated both his professional and community life to the improvement of the medical profession. Today he retires from over 42 years of service as a physician and member of the Board of Directors of Community Hospitals of Central California.

Dr. O'Brien opened his medical practice in Fresno in 1945, after graduating from the College of Osteopathic Physicians and Surgeons in Los Angeles. He and six other physicians purchased the Sample Sanitarium and converted it into Sequoia Hospital in 1946.

Dr. O'Brien served as a charter member and president of the Sequoia Hospital Board of Trustees, and in other official capacities until 1955, when the hospital merged to become Sierra Hospital.

Dr. O'Brien was a charter member of the Sierra Hospital Foundation Board, served as secretary and was elected president in 1982.

In addition, Dr. O'Brien has served as a member of every Sierra Hospital Medical Staff Committee, chairman of the department of medicine and president of the medical staff.

Since January 1983, he has served as vice president of the Board of Directors of Community Hospitals of Central California until this day, when he retires from the board and the medical profession.

Through the years, Dr. O'Brien made sure Sequoia Hospital grew to accommodate the changing medical needs of the city of Fresno. Please join me and the Board of Directors of Community Hospitals of Central California in honoring Dr. Kenneth O'Brien for his invaluable service to the medical community.●

THE U.S. CONSTITUTION AND THE RIGHT TO VOTE

● Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I would like to take a moment today to acknowledge a very significant event that occurred in Alaska on election day. Across the State of Alaska a student mock election was held in conjunction with an essay contest on "The U.S. Constitution and the Right to Vote." Over 250 students participated in the essay contest alone. I find this very encouraging.

The right to vote is a privilege that should not be taken lightly. I visited with these students at their polling headquarters. Let me hasten to add, some of these students do not agree with me. They did not support President Bush as I did—and at least one of their comments might provoke a response from me. But, these are their essays—their words—not mine.

Mr. President, I ask that the essays of the three first place winners from their specific age groups—Bronwyn K. Rick, Tessie Buttram, and Greg Ha—be printed in the RECORD.

THE U.S. CONSTITUTION AND THE RIGHT TO VOTE

(By Bronwyn K. Rick—grade 6)

Will my vote make a difference? I think that the answer to that question is yes. Somebody can win an election by just one vote, and someday that one vote might be mine.

People think that their vote doesn't make a difference, so why should they vote? That is a difficult question. Their vote is just as important as anyones, a Congressman's, a Governor's, or even the President's.

Sometimes, when people run in an election they aren't satisfied when they win by just a few votes. What they don't realize is that those few votes were given by people; people who took the time out to vote for them. Their vote does make a difference.

When we vote in an election we express how we feel about a candidate. We are saying that their ideas are good and that we believe in them. We believe that they can do a good job, and that we support them.

When we vote we help turn our state and country into a better place, and that depending on the ideas we may help modernize and improve the well-being of our nation. We can help poor people, clean up our streets, and improve the overall quality of life. All of these ideas come through voting.

Voting shows people of all the other countries in the world that we, the American people, can all come together as one and vote for someone peacefully. We say that we really do believe in America and that it should be led by a true and faithful leader. Voting shows commitment to our country. When people vote for any candidate we are showing that they have some quality or idea that the other candidates does not have. Sometimes people believe in many different candidates, but they pick the one whose ideas, values and philosophies are nearest to their own.

How do I know who to vote for? I listen to what the candidates have to say. I like the candidates who don't say any negative things about their competitors. I think that shows the bad side of them. People like me want to hear what good things each individual candidate can do, and about their accomplishments. That is how candidates get positive votes.

Voters should study the candidates so that we can know more about them, their platform and beliefs. If we study them, and like their ideas, we can contribute and support their campaign, so even more people will learn about "our" candidate. That will help them grow stronger and even better known.

I believe that we get a real choice in elections because we are free to vote for whomever we want. No one has the right to stop us from voting in a private situation for our chosen candidate or amendments. The Constitution says that any citizen of voting age has the right to vote no matter what their sex, race, or political preference is.

Sometimes people don't vote. When they don't vote that means that they don't really care about how America turns out or who leads us. They then should not have any right to say anything bad about the outcome of the elections.

Americans have one thing that many other countries do not have. That one thing is freedom. We must not abuse that right, we must be proud of this. Freedom gives us the right to say yes or no to anyone or anything that we want, by way of voting without fear of being punished for our feelings. Sometimes to protect our freedoms we are called on to do things that are not especially pleasant or we don't want to do, like go to war to defend our nation or pay taxes to support our country.

We the people, all joined together are the ones who get a real choice by participating in elections, and by defending the rights our constitution provides for us.

THE U.S. CONSTITUTION AND THE RIGHT TO VOTE

(By Tessie Buttram—grade 9)

I think that if you are a woman or of a racial minority you should take advantage of your right to vote. After all, you didn't always have that right. It used to be only white men who could vote. Racial minority citizens weren't able to vote until amendment 15 was ratified February 3, 1870. Amendment 15 Section one says, "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the U.S. or by any state on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." Women weren't allowed to vote until Amendment 19 was put into effect August 18, 1920. Amendment 19 more-or-less says that the right of citizens to vote shall not be denied because of sex.

In the last election, November 1984, (according to the 1988 World Almanac) 40.8% of the 18-24 year old age group voted. This percentage is compared to the 25-44 year old age group of 58.4 percent. That's a 17.6% difference. This is only one of the reasons why we should be educating America's teens to vote in high school. This issue can be stressed by holding practice elections. You have people rallies fueling election week to get us in the spirit. Tell us where to register and then maybe you will see a voting percentage increase.

Thanks to women's liberation, our country's complete turn-around in morals and values, we have more women in office than ever before. Someday I hope to see a woman President. It could be possible that only we, the future generation, can decide. So exercise your right to vote, and take pride in doing so.

LOST POWER—THE RIGHT TO VOTE

(By Greg Ha—grade 11)

The right to vote in America today has been neglected. Voting power is dominated by individual special interest groups, mainly the wealthy; the popular vote has become a minority vote. In retrospect there is an incredible irony contrasting how Americans view the right to vote now than in the past. Altogether voting power is sadly, but truly diminishing.

When the average apathetic American gives up their right to vote, they leave their decision up to someone else. This process is like dominos; when a person gives up their right to vote they strengthen the vote of the person who does vote, in theory. Take for instance the 1988 Presidential Campaign. An issue which Americans hear about is taxes. George Bush, the Republican nominee, tells America to read his lips, "No new taxes." On the other hand Mike Dukakis says he would raise taxes as a last resort. The tactic which Bush is using is the same one Ronald Reagan used in 1980 and 1984. The tactic is that by not raising taxes he appeals to the upper-middle class and wealthy; the individuals who make up the majority of registered voters. So as a result taxes stay low, Bush gets elected and raids other funds like Social Security or homes for the poor. This issue is just one example of how the right to vote is neglected. Voting can not be for the people, if it is not by the people.

Irony haunts the power to vote. In the past men struggled for the right to vote. Today in places like Burma and Korea people struggle for a more democratic process, giving up their lives in their quest. In early America women and blacks sacrificed themselves as martyrs for equal rights including the right to vote. Now that all Americans have the right to vote they seem complacent enough not even to practice what they struggled so hard for. The right to vote is present for all to take advantage of, but sadly it is being neglected, and manipulated by the wealthy.

The neglected power of voting is no longer a power. Voting power has the potential to command this nation anyway it desires. Unfortunately the majority of the American public is ignorant and naive. As a result the right to vote is at the heels of the wealthy and is haunted by irony. If only America could look back and appreciate what lengths the right to vote has come, America would be a better nation.●

MASON CITY HIGH SCHOOL BAND

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, I rise today to commend the Mason City High School Band for their excellence in the performing arts. The band was recently recognized for their fine work by receiving the "Sudler Flag of Honor," an award bestowed by the John Philip Sousa Foundation.

Sudler Flag of Honor Awards are made possible through the generosity of Louis and Virginia Sudler. Louis Sudler is himself a performer and businessman who has extended his love for music by assisting and inspiring talented young musicians. Over the years he has established scholarships and awards for young talented musicians through the Louis Sudler Foundation and the Sousa Foundation. The Sudler Flag of Honor Program itself has been in operation for 6 years, presenting 23 bands across the United States with this honor.

Criteria for receiving the Sudler Flag include standards of excellence in concert activities consistently over several years; competitive evaluation at State, regional, national, or international levels, and standards for the director of the band.

I am proud that a band receiving such high distinction is an Iowa band. The Mason City High School Band was one of only three bands to receive this award for 1988. Under the direction of Mr. Gilbert Letto, the Mason City Band is certainly to be commended for its hard work over the years. The efforts of those young musicians have paid off. They, along with Mr. Letto, will be honored on May 12 at a presentation ceremony in Des Moines during the 62d annual convention of the Iowa Bandmasters Association. The attendees will have the opportunity at that time to listen to why the band is deserving of the Sudler Award.●

ELECTRIFIED FENCE ON SOUTH AFRICA MOZAMBIQUE BORDER

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, last year the Subcommittee on Foreign Operations asked the State Department Bureau of Refugee Affairs to report on the electrified fence on the South Africa-Mozambique border. South Africa installed this barrier to keep out Mozambique refugees fleeing from the civil strife there.

According to the report which I recently received in my new capacity as chairman of the subcommittee, the fence is charged with a potentially lethal 3,300 volts. In 1987 alone, 52 people were killed and hundreds more seriously injured. Ironically, despite these casualties, the fence has proven ineffective as a border control. An estimated 11,500 Mozambiquans crossed into South Africa along that border last year.

Mr. President, it would be difficult to conceive of a more barbaric way to control migration. These are refugees fleeing the devastation of RENAMO, the South African backed insurgency, which according to the State department is responsible for murdering 100,000 civilians.

I was relieved to read that the United States is on record opposing this outrageous barrier. Jonathan Moore, the United States Coordinator for Refugee Affairs, has complained to the South African Government about the fence. He urged them to at least reduce the voltage below a lethal charge. Unfortunately, his appeals have so far been ignored.

In view of the serious human rights issue this fence presents, and because many Senators may be unaware of its existence, I ask that the full text of the report be printed in the RECORD.

The report follows:

REPORT BY BUREAU FOR REFUGEE PROGRAMS TO SENATE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE: ELECTRIFIED FENCE ON THE SOUTH AFRICA-MOZAMBIQUE BORDER

The Government of South Africa operates a lethally charged electric fence on a portion of its border with Mozambique running north from Swaziland. The Senate Appropriations Committee, in language discussing the 1989 Refugee and Migration Account Appropriation, noted with alarm reports it had received of Mozambican civilians dying as a result of encountering the electric fence constructed by South African authorities and requested the Bureau for Refugee Programs to submit by December 31, 1988 a report on the situation and efforts the United States has taken to relieve it.

The South African Government (SAG) began lethally charging the fence about June, 1986. The purpose of the fence, which the SAG operates with the acquiesence of the Government of the People's Republic of Mozambique (GPRM), is to control the influx of Mozambicans, entering for whatever reason, into South Africa.

PHYSICAL CHARACTERISTICS OF THE FENCE

In June, 1986, the fence was only 30 kilometers long but has undergone regular expansion to its present length of 90 kilometers. The first 30 kilometer stretch was from the Crocodile River south towards Komatipoort, the second stretch of 30 kilometers was from Swaziland north along the border between the so-called homeland of Kangwane and Mozambique, and the final stretch connected the first two. The lethal portion of the fence extends 62.4 kilometers from the southern tip of Kruger Park to the northern tip of Swaziland. The fence carries 3,300 volts. There are no current plans to further extend the fence. (A second electric fence with non-lethal voltage has been erected along Mozambique's southern border with the "homeland" of Kwazulu.)

USG officials recently visited the fence in the vicinity of Komatipoort. The electrified barrier consists of three rolls of barbed wire about ten feet high. Several electrified wires run through the barbed wire and are connected to electric relay posts. These in turn are connected to a central computer which reports where any contact with the fence has occurred. The electrified barrier has non-electrified fences on both sides at a distance of about 10 feet.

FENCE RELATED DEATHS AND INJURIES

The only statistics on deaths and injuries are compiled by the South African Defense Ministry. In March of 1988, Defense Minister Magnus Malan stated in Parliament that 46 people had been killed by the fence between June 1, 1986 and February 15, 1988. However, SAG officials have at other times informed Embassy personnel that the fence claimed 52 lives in 1987 and 16 in the first half of 1988. An unknown number of persons have received severe burns from the fence. In January of 1988, a USG official was told that 50 to 100 severe burns had been seen by local homeland officials dealing with refugees.

In addition to the deaths and injuries resulting from contact with the fence, an unknown number of Mozambicans, after successfully navigating the fence, are shot or otherwise injured by South African Defense Forces attempting to capture them. Although SAG officials claim policy is to use minimum force in intercepting Mozambicans, local hospitals have reported numerous instances of gunshot wounds which Mozambicans received while crossing the fenced border.

IMPACT OF THE FENCE ON MIGRATION

Despite the number of deaths and injuries resulting from attempts to cross the fence, it has proven ineffective as a border control. According to SAG officials, about 11,500 Mozambicans crossed into Kangwane homeland in the past year. The Mozambicans use a variety of methods (such as tunnelling, use of rubber tires or tree trunks to cross over, and vaulting) to avoid burning or electrocution. Mozambican "guides" also bring people across for a fee. There are many Mozambicans who, after being deported by the SAG, recross the fence, some repeatedly.

U.S. EFFORTS TO RELIEVE THE SITUATION

The fence first came to our attention in late 1986. It became part of the USG agenda in dealing with South Africa in early 1987 and has been raised at increasingly higher levels as our concerns have gone unmet. In a meeting with Foreign Minister Botha in October of 1987, Ambassador Perkins expressed our opinion that the operation of the fence constitutes a human rights violation. The electrification of the fence and resultant deaths and injuries were criticized in the Annual Human Rights Report for 1987. In October of 1988, the U.S. Coordinator for Refugees Ambassador Jonathan Moore inspected the fence and met with officials of the Mozambican and South African governments to discuss refugee issues, including the fence. In those meetings he conveyed to both sides the USG position that the use of the lethal charge in the fence was an unnecessarily harsh way to deal with the border situation (SAG officials with whom Ambassador Moore met noted in response to questioning that a non-lethal charge would be equally effective in deterring entry). He also asserted that the fence resulted in the denial of asylum to Mozambicans genuinely fleeing the chaotic security situation in their home country.

A major obstacle to relieving the injuries and deaths caused by the electric fence is that the GPRM acquiesced in the building of the fence and supports its continued operation. As early as March of 1987, USG officials raised the issue of the fence with GPRM officials, who had no reaction. SAG officials have reported that they and Mozambican military officials consult regularly about the fence and other border problems. The GPRM apparently has its own security concerns involving the RENAMO insurgency which favor the continued operation of the fence and which have, in addition, led the GPRM to plant anti-personnel mines in many areas on its side of the border.

CURRENT U.S. INITIATIVES

The fence itself is only one part of a larger problem: the inability of Mozambicans to find asylum in South Africa. Over 200,000 Mozambicans present in South Africa are believed to have fled the civil strife caused by the RENAMO insurgency. Some 35,000 refugees who are in Kangwane and Gazankulu are allowed to stay; the SAG has not interfered with the local authorities' decision to grant them visitor's permits. However, the SAG forcibly repatriates Mozambicans whom it catches outside the "homelands" without work permits (26,870 deported in 1987). The SAG has no judicial process by which these individuals can seek refugee status or appeal a decision to return them to Mozambique. The GPRM is unable to provide secure sites on which to settle these individuals when they are forced back. By repatriating the refugees, the SAG is again exposing them to the insecure, dangerous conditions from which they originally fled.

The current U.S. approach is to address the overall policy of protecting Mozambican asylum seekers in, or attempting to enter, South Africa. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, the international agency normally charged with protecting the rights of refugees, has no presence in South Africa and therefore cannot effectively intervene to assist the Mozambicans. The Department of State is pressing both the SAG and GPRM to allow more international involvement in the border situation in order to provide greater protection and assistance to Mozambicans seeking relief from the ongoing warfare in that troubled country.

We are also exerting our influence to promote a peaceful resolution of Mozambican conflict, which has been a primary cause of refugees fleeing into South Africa. We continue to press for adherence to the 1984 Nkomati accord between South Africa and Mozambique, which prohibits destabilization efforts against each other. The Department's Bureau for Refugee Programs commissioned and widely distributed the report in April, 1988 on the RENAMO atrocities within Mozambique and their affect on the generation of refugee flows to neighboring countries. On September 12 of this year, Presidents P.W. Botha and Joaquim Chissano met in Mozambique to revitalize this accord, raising hope that reduced South African support for RENAMO and expanded bilateral ties between South Africa and Mozambique will create conditions which are more favorable to regional peace.●

REPORT ON THE MIDDLE EAST

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, on January 3 I was privileged to become chairman of the Foreign Operations Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee. My first official act was to leave on January 4 for Israel and Egypt.

These two nations are by far the largest recipients of U.S. foreign assistance, receiving over $5 billion between them. That is more than one-third of our entire foreign aid budget of some $14.2 billion in fiscal 1989. A number of factors made it important that I go to the Middle East at this time.

First was the fact of my own chairmanship. I needed to meet with the leaders of Egypt and Israel, and they wanted to get to know the new chairman of the Foreign Operations Subcommittee, certainly one of the most important bodies in the United States Senate as far as their interests are concerned.

Second was the installation of a new government in Israel, and the prospect that Israel might now be in a position to make political decisions about the stalled Middle East peace process and the terrible situation in the West Bank and Gaza. A visit would give me an opportunity to see for myself what is happening in the territories, and to discuss directly with Israeli leaders their ideas for ending this tragedy in a way that comports with the sense of justice, democracy, and decency which prevails in Israel.

And, finally, there was the advent of a new President here in the United States, with the chance that a renewed effort might be made to help Israel, Egypt, and moderate Arabs rebuild the once bright hopes for peace coming out of the Camp David accords and the Israel-Egypt Peace Treaty.

Mr. President, I believe my discussions in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Hebron, and Cairo were valuable. I came away with a strong sense of the urgency for American leadership, for the sake of Israel and for the sake of the Arabs, including the Palestinians. President Reagan and Secretary of State Shultz left the new administration a helpful legacy in its opening to the PLO. This opening could produce movement toward dialog and contact.

Immediately after my return, I met with Secretary of State Baker to summarize my discussions and my impressions. I spoke to him of the longing of both Israelis and Arabs for strong American leadership in the Middle East, and I emphasized the enormous importance for Israel of an alternative to violence in the West Bank and Gaza.

The Middle East should be a top foreign policy priority of President Bush and Secretary Baker. It is one area where only the sustained and personal involvement of the President himself can guide U.S. policy and shape events.

I prepared a report on my trip to Israel and Egypt for the Appropriations Committee. In the hope that it may be of use to my colleagues in the Senate, I ask that my report might be included in the RECORD at this point.

The report follows:

MIDDLE EAST TRIP REPORT

(By Senator Patrick Leahy)

INTRODUCTION

From January 5–12, my delegation and I visited Israel and Egypt. This was my first trip as the new chairman of the Foreign Operations Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee. My choice of Israel and Egypt as the first countries to visit as chairman was deliberate. These two nations are by far the largest recipients of US foreign assistance, reflecting their enormous political and strategic importance to this country. They are the only two nations in the Middle East thus far to have the courage and statemanship to make peace and normalize relations. I wished to signal my strong support to them. It also seemed appropriate that my first act as chairman of the subcommittee charged with preparing the Foreign Operations appropriation, which contains the vast bulk of US foreign aid, would be to visit the two single greatest beneficiaries of the generosity of the American people.

My delegation spent 4 days in Israel and two and a half days in Egypt. In so short a time, it is possible only to gain impressions and insights, not to become an expert in the enormous problems of that troubled region. Nevertheless, in an intensive schedule of meetings, briefings, visits and inspections, I was able to gather information that will be of great value to me and to the Foreign Operations subcommittee as we begin to work on the Foreign Operations appropriations bill for Fiscal Year 1990.

In Israel, I met with Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, Defense Minister Yitzhak Rabin, Finance Minister Shimon Peres, Israeli military intelligence, officials of the Foreign Ministry, senior officers of the Israeli Defense Forces, Members of the Knesset, Israeli scientists and environmentalists, agriculture specialists, representatives of the American embassy in Tel Aviv and the Consulate General in Jerusalem, and many others, including Palestinian notables in the West Bank. In Egypt, I met with President Hosni Mubarak, Deputy Prime Minister and Defense Minister Field Marshall Abu Ghazala, Presidential Advisor Osama el Baz, Egyptian developmental officials, representative of the US Embassy and US AID Mission, and a good many Egyptian citizens at the Helwan Housing Project.

For all these meetings, and for the time and patience of our hosts, I and my delegation are extremely grateful.

On this trip I was ably assisted by a number of people, including Ms. Ellen McCuloch-Lovell of my staff, Mr. Eric Newsom, staff director of the Foreign Operations subcommittee, Mr. James Bond, minority staff member of the Foreign Operations subcommittee, Dr. Henry Gaffney, Director of Plans of the Defense Security Assistance Agency and Mr. Morton Dworken, Director of the Office of Security Sales and Assistance in the Department of State. My thanks to them, and to the many people from the US embassies, consulates and missions who also assisted.

Israel

Israel is preoccupied with the Palestinian uprising in the West Bank and Gaza. Its leaders are struggling to find a successful strategy for dealing with the uprising, or intifada, that is consonant with the humane, democratic values of Israel and the Israeli people. Unfortunately, a great many Palestinians have died in the violence since December 1987, over 370, and also a number of Israelis, about 15. The toll in human life has been inexcusably high.

The scenes of turmoil and confrontations between Israeli soldiers and Palestinian demonstrators, the latter often very young teenagers, have been ugly. There has been a considerable impact on American public opinion, as demonstrated by a national poll shortly after my return which indicated a majority of Americans oppose Israel's actions in the West Bank and Gaza. In addition, the effect on Israeli public opinion has been immense. Israeli leaders conceded that the Israeli people are deeply divided, with roughly half favoring a hardline no compromise stance towards the intifada and the territories, and the other half wanting to see a negotiated solution that accommodates in some degree the aspirations of the Palestinians. There is a great debate underway in Israel prompted by the intifada, with no consensus as yet emerging as to what directions the Israeli people wish to see their government take.

Opinions of Israeli leaders about the impetus and leadership of the intifada varied, with some arguing it is inspired, led and sustained from the outside, principally by the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO). Others, including a number of key military officers, legislators and diplomats with whom I spoke, firmly believe the intifada is an indigenous phenomenon, a true nationalist rising by the Palestinians of the West Bank and Gaza. One of the most perceptive assessments I heard was from a senior Israeli military officer, who said the intifada represents a generational watershed. He argued that the older Palestinians had acquiesced in Israeli control of the territories, but the young Palestinians—and the majority of Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza are under 30 I was told—will no longer quietly accept Israeli rule.

On one point, most, though no all, of the Israelis with whom I spoke were agreed: the intifada cannot be repressed by military force, and can only be solved by some political process that responds to Palestinian demands to have a voice in their own future. The agonizing dilemma for Israeli leaders, political and military, is what that political process might be and how to establish it without appearing to bow to force.

The attitude of Israeli leaders respecting the short term policy of dealing with the intifada varied, with the majority opinion seeming to believe that more force is necessary to contain the violence and to show the demonstrators that force will not pay. Other Israelis insisted that violence only led to more violence, instilling a sense of martyrdom and exaltation among the young Palestinians. Israeli leaders indicated that they are aware of the impressions conveyed to world opinion by the use of force against the Palestinian rioters, but argued that people must recognize that it would be folly for Israel to make concessions in the face of violence. Some Israelis equated such a stance with giving in to terrorist demands.

Clearly, many Israeli leaders are deeply disturbed by having to use soldiers to maintain public order, a police task. They fear the impact on the morale, readiness and psychological outlook of Israeli soldiers, both regular and reserve, who have to serve in the West Bank and Gaza. That such concerns are justified is demonstrated by Prime Minister Shamir's confrontational meeting with young IDF soldiers shortly after I left Israel, in which the soldiers protested having to carry out the Government's policy of force in the West Bank and Gaza.

Israeli leaders almost uniformly told me they understood the importance of Israel regaining the initiative in the peace process. Most were disturbed or angered by the American opening to the PLO, announced shortly before my visit. Senior Israeli leaders insisted the American decision was a great mistake which would encourage further violence and terrorism, and would impede Israeli attempts to revive the peace process. Their opinion was that PLO leader Yassir Arafat failed to meet fundamental American conditions, and that what they regarded as his ambiguous statements were merely a tactical move to gain the diplomatic initiative.

Several Israeli leaders spoke to me in very general terms about a new Israeli peace initiative for the West Bank and Gaza. From what little was said, such an initiative appears to be a variant of the West Bank and Gaza portion of the Camp David Accords of 1978. The key elements of such an initiative would seem to be elections in the West Bank and Gaza for local officials who would administer some form of autonomy and participate in negotiations with Israel and perhaps other parties, such as Jordan, on a long-term solution to the status of the West Bank and Gaza. It should be noted that all Palestinians with whom I spoke in the West Bank firmly rejected the concept of local elections under Israeli control, either to administer West Bank autonomy under Israeli authority or to select Palestinians with whom Israel could negotiate the final status of the territories. Palestinians insisted no elections were necessary to select their representatives for negotiations, since the PLO already represented Palestinians in the West Bank, Gaza and elsewhere. These Palestinians also declared emphatically that Camp David as it applied to the West Bank and Gaza was dead. Any solution to the status of the territories would have to be based on a fresh initiative, they said.

Some Israeli leaders told me that if persons associated with the PLO were among those chosen by the inhabitants of the West Bank and Gaza in free elections to represent them in negotiations with Israel for autonomy and for a solution to the permanent status of the West Bank and Gaza, Israel would sit down with such representatives. Israel's only condition was that such persons not be terrorists and have repudiated violence as the means to solve the question of the status of the territories. Some Israelis expressed skepticism that PLO members ever would satisfy this condition, but others were optimistic that such a step would eventually occur once it became clear that the intifada would not force Israel to make concessions regarding the status of the West Bank and Gaza.

It is clear from my discussions that Israel faces severe economic problems, in part exacerbated by the costs, direct and indirect, of the intifada. I was told inflation is rising again, economic growth is low, and Israel finds itself gripped in the "stagflation" which plagued much of Western Europe and the United States in the 1970s. Leaders said politically and socially difficult measures are needed, including privatization of much of government activities, reduction of taxes that constrain private initiative, lowering of massive central government deficits, and a cutback in the role of government in the economy. It was suggested that many of the economic gains of the early 1980s made with enormous U.S. financial assistance, are being lost through low growth and inefficiencies in the centrally managed economy.

Israelis told me the real burden on the Israeli economy is the staggering defense budget. Now, more than half the defense budget goes to repay foreign loans to buy advanced military equipment. This leaves little to cover the operational, training and readiness costs of the Israeli Defense Forces.

Dealing with Israel's pressing economic problems is complicated by the West Bank and Gaza situation. I heard estimates of as much as a 2% loss in Israel's Gross National Product because of labor, trade and other disruptions, as well as the direct costs to the Israeli government, because of the intifada. Some Israelis with whom I met indicated that tourism, an important foreign exchange earner, was down significantly, perhaps as much as 25% by some estimates. They attributed this fall in tourism to perceptions of widespread violence, though in fact demonstrations are confined to the West Bank and Gaza.

Egypt

Unfortunately, due to time limitations, my stay in Egypt was even briefer than my visit to Israel, only two and half days. However, in that time I was privileged to meet President Mubarak, as well as other senior Egyptian figures.

Discussions in Egypt focused more on the profound economic and social problems besetting that country, and the use Egyptians are making a large scale U.S. economic and military assistance. Egypt is confronting a massive foreign debt, and is approaching a crisis in its ability to meet its debt payments. Very difficult negotiations have been in progress for some time with both the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund for substantial infusions of badly needed foreign exchange. However, these negotiations are lagging because of Egypt's unwillingness to agree to wideranging economic reforms. These reforms, which the United States also believes are necessary, involved austerity measures and structural reforms which would be painful to the Egyptian people. If Egypt's leaders miscalculate the tolerance of their people for more sacrifice and if the reforms take unduly long to produce beneficial results, there could be dangerous political turmoil.

Egyptian leaders also made clear they dislike US insistence on attaching conditions to the release of some of its economic assistance. These conditions are related to internal economic and governmental reforms and to progress in negotiations with the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. The Egyptians believe they have made significant progress in dismantling the inefficient economic structure left by President Nasser, and they are the best judges of how fast their system can tolerate change.

Egypt's reluctance to agree to risky economic reforms that may take years to pay off is understandable. At the same time, US officials stressed that failure to restructure Egypt's centralized "socialist" economy, with its manifold inefficiencies, huge bureaucracy, staggering waste, corruption and abuse, only postpones the day of reckoning. Difficult decisions cannot be delayed much longer.

The Foreign Operations subcommittee, under the able leadership of my predecessor, Senator Inouye, and Senator Kasten, introduced a provision in the foreign assitance appropriation which permitted holders of military assistance debt to refinance that debt at lower rates of interest now prevailing. Israel has availed itself of that provision, as has Turkey. However, Egypt has as yet failed to take advantage of this arrangement to refinance its pre-1985 military assistance debt, totaling more than $5 billion, at significantly lower interest rates. Egyptian officials explained that on reason for their hesitation was Egyptian expectation that the world community would soon find a formula for relieving at least official debt for Third World nations, and that therefore Egypt was reluctant to refinance its official debt with the United States with commercial banks, and perhaps jeopardize the chance to have some or all that debt written off. Whether justified or not, this Egyptian expectation underlines the importance of the United States and the developed nations coming to grips soon with the pressing problem of Third World debt.

As for the peace process and the Palestinian problem, Egypt's leaders praised the US opening to the PLO and urged that it be followed up with substantive moves to revive the moribund Middle East peace process. Senior Egyptians stressed that no efforts for peace in the Middle East could succeed without active American participation as mediator and facilitator. They urged that the new Administration make restarting the peace process in the Middle East a top priority, and indicated they were willing to be supportive of American efforts.

One important point that was made in my discussions was that Egypt regards the Camp David Accords as they relate to the West Bank and Gaza as obsolete. Evidently, the Egyptians share the belief of West Bank Palestinians that any solution to the status of the West Bank and Gaza will have to be on a different basis than the autonomy plan embodied in the Camp David Accords. Egyptians stressed that this view in no way affected Egypt's adherence to the Egypt-Israel Peace Treaty. All Egyptian leaders with whom I spoke emphasized that they had made their peace with Israel, and it was up to the rest of the Arab world to make the same fundamental decision. As for Egypt, they said, its main concern now is economic development and improvement of the lives of its people.

HELWAN HOUSING PROJECT

In my visit to Cairo, I requested that AID take me on a tour of the massive Hewan Housing Project, on the outskirts of the city. This is one of the largest such projects AID has undertaken, involving the construction of over 7,500 units for poor Egyptian families. What I found was illustrative of the many problems of undertaking large scale development projects in Third World conditions.

Begun ten years ago, and with a five year target date for completion, the Helwan Housing Project is still far from completed. When I left Washington, I had been told that no families had yet been housed, after ten years of work and over $135 million provided by AID. Once I arrived, I was told in fact the first 15 families had taken up occupancy. Once on the site, the number had risen to 48, and before I left it approached one hundred. At that rate, had my visit lasted three more days, more than three hundred Egyptian families might have had housing.

In fact, despite an appalling story of mismanagement, misunderstanding, red tape, inefficiency and waste, the Helwan Housing Project at last seems to be reaching the payoff point. Project managers predicted that units would soon begin to be occupied at the rate of 100 families per month, and that the first large blocks of housing would be finished within another two years. It will still be several years before the entire complex is done, if it ever is. However, at the Project, I visited schools, workshops, clinics, small private enterprises, and other community facilities started under the program. I saw poor Egyptians having for the first time real opportunity for work, housing, decent health care, education for their young.

The difficulty with the Helwan Housing Project is that it is finally attaining these very real goals only after tremendous waste and loss of time. It is hard to find reasonable explanations for why a five year project is still far from complete a decade later, and why only a tiny handful of the more than 7,000 Egyptian families have found clean, healthy housing after more than $130 million of the American taxpayers' money has been spent.

AID's explanation is that its initial mistake was to attempt an innovative approach to low income housing without first obtaining the full fledged support of the Egyptian housing bureaucracy. AID wanted to build units for ownership by the occupants, with full payment of a mortgage. The idea was to instill a sense of personal commitment to the success of the project by those who would borrow to buy their own dwelling. However, the Egyptian bureaucracy was used to a system of subsidized government-owned housing rented to the occupants. Because of the very different points of view, AID project managers found themselves entwined in masses of Egyptian red tape, and were unable to keep the project on schedule.

AID insists it has learned valuable lessons from the Helwan experience, and that it will never again design a project so out of keeping with the managerial, technical and financial resources of the host government. Perhaps this is so. Nevertheless, the Helwan Housing Project, its conception, design, management, implementation and Agency oversight will be a subject of Foreign Operations subcommittee inquiry.●

BUDGET SCOREKEEPING REPORT

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I hereby submit to the Senate the latest budget scorekeeping report for fiscal year 1989, prepared by the Congressional Budget Office in response to section 308(b) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as amended. This report was prepared consistent with standard scorekeeping conventions. This report also serves as the scorekeeping report for the purposes of section 311 of the Budget Act.

This report shows that current level spending is over the budget resolution by $0.9 billion in budget authority, and over the budget resolution by $0.4 billion in outlays. Current level is under the revenue floor by $0.3 billion.

The current estimate of the deficit for purposes of calculating the maximum deficit amount under section 311(a) of the budget act is $135.7 billion, $0.3 billion below the maximum deficit amount for 1988 of the $136.0 billion.

The report follows:

BALTIC FREEDOM DAY

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to cosponsor a joint resolution, introduced by my colleague, Senator RIEGLE from Michigan, designating June 14, 1989, as "Baltic Freedom Day." The purpose of this measure is to express Congress' concern over the Soviet Union's continued subjugation, oppression, and Russification of the Baltic people of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia. However, some encouraging developments have occurred over the past several years brightening their chance to achieve their shining goal and autonomy.

Only 2 years ago last month, the Lithuanian people celebrated for the first time in 47 years, their first steps toward independence and neutrality. They have joined together to demand a "free Lithuania," organized by the Sajudis reform movement and approved by the local Communist Party. Almost 200,000 people, in both Lithuania and in Kaunas, the Lithuanian capitol from 1920-39, united to assert their right to exercise "freedom of choice," in response to Gorbachev's speech to the United Nations in December 1986. The Sajudis manifesto included the restoration of Lithuania's "traditional status of neutrality in a European demilitarized zone, as well as universally accepted human and civil freedoms, from which flows the general right of Lithuanian's citizens independently to choose and develop their own forms of state existence." In an effort to improve East-West relations, struggles such as this should not go unnoticed.

June 14, 1989, will mark the 49th anniversary of the United States nonrecognition policy toward the Soviet's illegal occupation of Lithuania Latvia, and Estonia. This policy will remain a sensitive issue of United States-Soviet relations until the Kremlin's hegemony of the Baltic States is relinquished. I am certain that we will continue to be as steadfast in this policy as our Baltic friends have been in their pursuit of freedom.

Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia each proclaimed their independence in 1918 and for 22 years they nurtured their newly found freedom—a freedom previously denied them for centuries by more powerful, aggressive neighbors. In 1920, the Soviet Union promised to recognize their independence.

By signing peace treaties with each Baltic State, the Soviet Union promised to "voluntarily and forever" renounce its sovereign rights over the territories of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia and to recognize without reservation their "independence, autonomy, and sovereignty." The Soviet Union's promise, however, was as hollow as any they have made before or since that time.

In 1940, the Soviet Union began its attempt to smother Baltic freedom. The Red Army stormed into Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia, and seized control of all three nations. The Soviets established in each nation a puppet regime which unanimously passed a "request" for incorporation into the Soviet Union. Late in 1940, these "requests" were enacted in Moscow.

The Soviet occupation began with a series of arrests and imprisonments that swelled into the tens of thousands of prisoners. On the evening of June 14, 1941, with the Soviet terror gathering momentum, they began a massive deportation program. Between 1944 and 1949, hundreds of thousands of Baltic people were herded into freight cars and exiled to distant parts of the Soviet Union. Those countless native Balts who were considered potential foes of Soviet imperialism were branded "enemies of the people" and were replaced by new settlers from the Soviet Union.

Under Stalin, Khrushchev, Brezhnev, Andropov, and Chernenko, thousands of Lithuanians, Latvians, and Estonians have been slaughtered, deported, exiled, and imprisoned in slave-labor camps or committed to psychiatric institutions. These ruthless dictators have pursued a Russification policy which has denied the Baltic people the most basic of human rights.

For the time being, the Soviet Union may have control of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia. But, without the consent of their freedom-loving people, the Soviet Union inevitably will regret its illegal and forced incorporation of these proud nations.

What the Soviets have done clearly flies in the face of the U.N. Universal Declaration on Human Rights and the Helsinki Final Act. Despite repeated professions of support for the principles embodied in the Final Act, the Soviets continue to violate the rights to self-determination guaranteed the Baltic people. As this act affirms, "All people always have the right, in full freedom, to determine, when and as they wish, their internal and external political status, without external interference, and to pursue as they wish their political, economic, social, and cultural development."

The degree and depth of Soviet denial of basic human and civil rights is not as deep as the Baltic people's desire for freedom and independence. The Balts' deeply rooted love of freedom and steadfast belief in the principles of independence have enabled them to endure Communist hegemony and suppression. They have lasted through years of Soviet subjugation, oppression, and Russification. Their spirit will not be broken, and their struggle for self-determination will not subside.

Mr. President, as a member and former Chairman of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, I remain deeply concerned about the Soviet Union's continuing human rights violations in Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia. As a party to the U.N. Charter and as a signatory of the Helsinki accords, the Soviet Union has pledged its respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. As such, the Soviet Union must accept the political and legal obligations that these agreements require.

When we celebrate June 14, 1989, as "Baltic Freedom Day," it is fitting and proper that we remind the Soviet Union of these obligations. I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this resolution to reaffirm our love for freedom and our commitment to the principles of independence for all peoples, for ourselves, and especially for our Baltic friends who have been forced to live in their absence.

I hope that encouraging developments in the Baltic States will be allowed to follow their natural course and become permanent. Until they become permanent, we must continue to be vocal advocates of Baltic freedom and vigilant sentries against the possibility of reversal of these important gains.●

SOVIET REFUGEES—S. 489

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today as an original cosponsor and strong supporter of S. 489, a bill introduced yesterday by the distinguished senior Senators from Massachusetts and Wisconsin, along with a number of our colleagues. This bill is intended to transfer $200 million in previously appropriated funds from the State Legalization Impact Assistance Grant Program established by the Immigration Reform Control Act of 1986 to programs to assist Soviet refugees.

In both the fiscal year 1990 and fiscal year 1991 budgets $300 million of the funds in the State Legalization Impact Assistance Grants Fund were recommended for rescission. We propose not to rescind all of these funds and to transfer $200 million as follows: $50 million to the Office of Refugee Resettlement of the Department of Health and Human Services for use only for grants under the Voluntary Agency Programs and for grants to States for domestic resettlement and assistance to refugees; and $150 million to the Department of State in the U.S. Emergency Refugee and Migration Assistance Fund.

Mr. President, we are facing a humanitarian and public diplomacy crisis. This crisis is caused by the large number of persons being allowed to emigrate by the Soviet Union. When we provided funds for refugee assistance for fiscal years 1988 and 1989, we did not anticipate the dramatic increases we have seen in emigration from the Soviet Union. Accordingly, we are not now able to pay for benefits for the larger than expected number of refugees desiring to come to the United States.

As a former Chairman and current Commissioner of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe—better known as the Helsinki Commission—I have attended many international meetings at which the United States has pressed the Soviet Union to live up to its international commitments to freedom of movement. In the past, the Iron Curtain really was iron, and people only managed to escape Soviet authority at great risk to their lives and families.

Now, we face the changes President Gorbachev has wrought in Soviet practices, including greater freedom to emigrate—and rising numbers of refugees wishing to come to the United States. Last year saw not only the rise in numbers of Soviet Jews allowed to leave, but, for the first time, Pentacostals and other religious dissidents being permitted to leave after years of severe persecution. Last year also saw a continuation of the struggle between Christian Armenians and Moslem Azerbaijanians over Nagorno-Karabakh, and the terrible Armenian earthquake, all of which combined to produce a rising wave of Armenian refugees.

We were unprepared for these developments and have not yet established a program for dealing with them. We are struggling to define such a program and I understand that progress is being made in the executive branch. However, a growing number of people are now stranded in Rome, Italy, and an increasing backlog of cases await processing in Moscow.

Worse, the Immigration and Naturalization Service is resorting to what I view as an erroneous interpretation of the Immigration and Naturalization Act to deal with what is, in essence, a resource problem. Because we do not have enough funds to pay the costs of the refugees desiring to come to the United States, we are simply deciding that they are not refugees!

This is an incredible situation. The law provides that—

[t]he term refugee means * * * any person who * * * is unable or unwilling to return to [his or her country], and is unable or unwilling to avail himself or herself of the protection of that country because of persecution or a well-founded fear of persecution on account of race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group, or political opinion. * * * (8 U.S.C. 1101(a)(42), emphasis added.)

It has been alleged that the INS, fully aware of a recent Supreme Court decision setting forth standards for applying the "persecution or well-founded fear of persecution" test, is not applying it properly. The effect of this misapplication is to reduce the number of people qualified for admission to the United States as refugees to a number equal to the resources available to pay for them.

This, if true, is a deeply regrettable bureaucratic decision. If it is true that the INS is doing this, it undercuts a principal U.S. human rights initiative and destroys good will built up with much effort through extensive public diplomacy by both executive branch and legislative branch leaders. It also presents to new immigrants a very, very poor picture of the way our constitutional system works. It leads them to believe that our laws are as conveniently flexible to the needs of Government policy as are Soviet laws.

For these reasons, among others, it is vital that we act, in concert with the executive branch, to resolve this problem. We need, through the emergency consultation process, to provide additional refugee numbers. We need to pass this bill to fund those numbers.

This bill will not provide a permanent solution to the problem. It will, however, allow the administration to handle a humanitarian crisis and stop a public diplomacy disaster before things get worse.

Mr. President, I ask my colleagues to join me and the other supporters of this important bill in pressing for its rapid consideration and passage. The more time we allow to pass without action, the worse conditions will become, and the greater the harm that will be done to innocent people and to the cause of human rights.●

NATIONAL DRINKING WATER WEEK

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in support of Senate Joint Resolution 60, a joint resolution designating the week of May 1-7, 1989, as "National Drinking Water Week." I commend my colleague and good friend from Arizona for taking the lead in increasing the awareness of the necessity of drinking water.

Water is one of our most important natural resources—necessary for most forms of existence. Unfortunately, it is too often taken for granted. Sometimes it takes a severe drought like last summer's for us to realize how much water is a part of our daily lives. Humans, after all, are 65 percent water.

National Drinking Water Week presents an excellent opportunity to recognize those who work to not only guarantee us a constant water supply, but also a clean supply.●

COMMENDING THE PRESIDENT'S REVIEW OF DEFENSE STRATEGY

● Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I wish to commend President Bush for having wisely and courageously chosen to begin his stewardship of American security by conducting a thoughtful and thorough review of U.S. defense and arms control strategy. His steadiness in the face of considerable pressures to act fast is simply another reminder of the people's sound judgment in electing him to our Nation's highest office.

As the President's national security team begins this review, they will doubtless consider the work of outside groups that have addressed U.S. strategy for the nineties. I have received and reviewed one such study, "Securing Strategic Stability" and its companion piece, "Deterring Through the End of the Century" from the Center for Strategic and International Studies. These are significant works that should, and doubtless will, command the attention of senior Bush administration officials.

While I endorse the need for such a review, Mr. President, and have the utmost respect for the study participants, I was deeply troubled by many of the underlying assumptions embedded in the study plan and in key aspects of the analytic methodology. I have serious questions with certain threat assessments and I flatly disagree with many of the work's critical conclusions. Since most of my criticisms relate to assumptions regarding U.S. war plans, operational capabilities, and deterrent posture, I sent the study to SAC headquarters and asked for an assessment of it by General Chain and his operational and analytic staff.

General Chain, in a January 26 letter to me, replied that "there are significant faults in the study's basic approach and analysis." He also observed that "the assumptions, not the analysis, drove the conclusions." I would put it differently—this report seems to be a solution—the small ICBM—in search of a problem.

Since the real world we live in, Mr. President, demands that we tighten our belts and solve real problems like improved force survivability, I am confident that President Bush will heed the advice of the SAC commander and press ahead with a credible, affordable, and survivable strategic modernization program.

I therefore look forward to working with the Bush administration in the upcoming strategic review.

Mr. President, because General Chain offered some commonsense perspectives on the land-based and air-breathing components of America's strategic deterrent forces, I ask that my original letter to him and his reply be printed in the RECORD.

The letters follow:

Gen. JOHN CHAIN,
CINC SAC, Omaha, NE.

DEAR JACK: I have recently received a copy of a study done by the Center for Strategic & International Studies entitled "Securing Strategic Stability". I have read the report with interest and am curious about your reaction.

In particular, I would very much appreciate your comments on the methodology, analysis and conclusions of the report.

I must confess, I find it a little difficult to square the report's conclusions regarding the SICBM and a "stretched" B-2 with a potential START agreement that heavily emphasizes air breathers and a budget environment that will mean severe fiscal constraints. It seems to me that the study panel places an incredible premium on your ability to do "single warhead targetting" and on your needs for absolute "zero warning" ICBM force survivability. I wonder whether you, as CINC SAC share these priorities and perspectives and would endorse the resource allocations recommended.

I would very much appreciate getting your comments on this report as soon as possible, hopefully before we begin hearings on the President's budget in February.

Please feel free to call me if you have any questions or need any clarification about the request. Thanks, Jack.

Sincerely,

PETE WILSON.

JANUARY 26, 1989.

Hon. PETE WILSON,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR PETE: Thank you for your letter regarding "Securing Strategic Stability," published by the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS). The study group's willingness to engage in systematic analysis of our strategic modernization alternatives is commendable. The group's recognition that a START Treaty without modernization will likely make us worse off is also refreshing. Nonetheless, there are significant faults in the study's basic approach and analysis. The assumptions, not the analysis, drove the conclusions. I'm afraid this effort, however worthy in conception, could cause more confusion than understanding in the months ahead.

The study begins on the wrong foot. On page 13, we're told that the central objective is crisis stability. (That's certainly a worthy goal, but not our only one.) We are then told that crisis stability implies having forces which are "withholdable regardless of alert condition," and that weapons such as PEACEKEEPER Rail Garrison are of little real use.

Let's stop and think about that line of reasoning. For those of us who like to deal in plain English, "crisis stability" means that (1) there is a crisis and (2) our forces have a stabilizing effect—exactly what Rail Garrison can deliver in a crisis. I am not aware of any crisis that did not include measures to improve our force posture. In a real crisis, we would disperse Rail Garrison forces, and they would be "withholdable." Rail Garrison will improve crisis stability, if you're talking about crises in the real world. And, in the real world, we've got the means to provide sufficient warning for Rail Garrison to disperse. (As you know, we've invested billions over the years to acquire the hardware and perfect the procedures.) We should recognize real world facts if we want a valid evaluation of Rail Garrison.

My staff has found that the analysis itself, as portrayed in the graphics has some apparent instances of bombers being credited with only START-countable surviving weapons instead of actual weapons, a major miscount. It should therefore be no surprise that bombers do not fare well in the bottom line comparisons.

Several other incorrect or misleading assumptions or factors were used to reach the conclusions. Only the "rideout" scenario was used, which is unrealistic and assumes away the value of our silo based ICBMs. Higher than realistic SSBN at-sea rates reduce the relative contributions of the ICBMs and bombers. Many options are simply unrealistic, e.g., only 11 B-52s in service in one alternative force. The fiscal guidance is too low, even if you compute it using the study's methodology; that error limits the potential solutions available.

Basically, the study assumes away Rail Garrison and undervalues the contributions of our bombers. The conclusions reflect the flaws in approach and analysis. In particular, I do not agree with the implication that we should pursue Small ICBM now at the expense of B-2.

The right answer for strategic modernization is to push ahead with vigorous Rail Garrison and B-2 programs now, and develop the Small ICBM later. Rail Garrison is here; it's affordable, and practical. The B-2 is a revolution in combat capability. (And, as you have noted, START puts a special premium on manned penetrators like the B-2.) The Small ICBM would be great right now—with its outstanding mobility and single-warhead targeting flexibility. However, we can't afford it now, and we'll have to wait.

Thanks for the opportunity to comment on the CSIS report. I look forward to discussing strategic modernization with you again soon.

Best wishes.

JOHN T. CHAIN, Jr.,
General, USAF, Commander in Chief, Strategic Air Command.●

NATIONAL STUDENT-ATHLETE DAY

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today in support of Senate Joint Resolution 39, a joint resolution designating April 6, 1989, as "National Student-Athlete Day," which I cosponsored on Janaury 31.

National Student-Athlete Day will help us give a much-needed recognition to the importance of athletics in a student's development. While academics and studying are paramount, athletic competition and participation in fitness programs are of great proven value to our young people. Sports are not just great exercise; they also help develop discipline and character.

I can personally vouch for the merits of sports program—I was a member of the Chaminade High School Track Team for 4 years and was lucky enough to attend Syracuse University on a track scholarship. Sports played an important part in my development—I think all of our children should be given the same opportunity.

This year's National Student-Athlete Day will emphasize the importance of education to athletes. We must stress the value of sports and fitness to students, but only in the context of obtaining an education.

Also stressed on April 6, will be the positive role of sports as an alternative to drug and alcohol abuse. Let's face it, too many American youth of all ages are turning to drugs—either as users or dealers or both. If more students with free time after school participated in their school's extracurricular sports programs, fewer would have the time or the interest for drugs. Participation in a team sport can help build a student's self-esteem and provide the confidence to "say no" to drugs.

The Federal Government supports several progams to focus on the potential role of student athletes to prevent drug abuse among their peers. In 1984, the Drug Enforcement Administration [DEA] began the Sports Drug Awareness Program, which emphasizes the role of the coach and student athlete. In a report on U.S. Anti-Drug Abuse Programs to the House Committee on Appropriations, the Sports Drug Awareness Program is described as follows:

> With the coaches' commitment to preventing narcotics and dangerous drug abuse, student athletes are encouraged to become role models using positive peer pressure to dissuade other students from using and abusing narcotics and dangerous drugs. DEA and FBI staff join with athletes, officials from professional sports, and high school coaches who have implemented successful programs to present clinics to help coaches develop programs in their high schools.

Last year's omnibus drug bill appropriated $3 million to fund another special program the National Youth Sports Program. These are just two examples of programs developing all over the Nation to combat our drug problem. Much, much, more needs to be done to rid this country of drugs—these programs are only a start.

National Student-Athlete Day presents an excellent opportunity to help our children grow both physically and mentally. I am proud to offer my support for this joint resolution.●

CONGRATULATIONS TO IRVEN ARMSTRONG, OUTSTANDING HOOSIER

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I ask you and my colleagues to join with me in congratulating an outstanding Hoosier, Mr. Irven Armstrong.

Mr. Armstrong has served as an educator, teacher, high school administrator, insurance specialist, speaker, World War I veteran and a prominent figure in the beginning and early development of Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity, Inc., an African-American Greek Letter College fraternity.

On March 7, 1989, Mr. Armstrong will celebrate his 97th birthday with his wife Alberta. He is the oldest living member of the Kappa Alpha Psi and one of the fraternity's most prominent members.

Irven Armstrong attended public schools until 1910. Mr. Armstrong and his brothers were the only black students to graduate from Westfield County School in the towns 150-year history. He then continued his education at Indian University, majoring in history, and he joined the Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity. His love for education fostered his decision to become a teacher. He began his career in an all black school in Hamilton County, IN, and then went on to a position as a high school administrator. After serving in World War I, Mr. Armstrong became an insurance specialist for the Old Liberty Life Insurance Co. in Chicago.

During his later life, Mr. Armstrong continued to be an extremely active member in his fraternity. In his 77 years as a member, he has been Polemarch in four chapters of the fraternity: Alpha Chapter; Indianapolis Alumni Chapter; Chicago Alumni Chapter; and Baltimore Alumni Chapter. In August, 1986, at the 75th Jubilee Conclave in Indianapolis, Mr. Armstrong was given the Laurel Wreath, which is the highest award given by his fraternity, in recognition of his contributions to his community, his excellent work as an educator, and for his continual dedication and work for Kappa Alpha Psi.

Irven Armstrong is a man of integrity and I am proud that he is a Hoosier. I ask my colleagues to join me in wishing him the best for another great year.●

BAN HIGH-POWERED ASSAULT WEAPONS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, the Chicago Defender recently had an editorial about assault weapons

It is hard to believe that anyone can defend the use of these assault weapons whose only aim is to kill as many human beings as possible in the shortest time possible.

I hope we will have the courage to ban these weapons.

They are becoming an increasing threat to our society.

I urge my colleagues to read this editorial, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

[From the Chicago Defender, Feb. 11, 1989]

BAN HIGH-POWERED ASSAULT WEAPONS

The Defender sincerely commends the Chicago and Maywood police departments for working together recently to seize a cache of high-powered assault weapons and explosives in the suburbs of Maywood and Westchester. Such incisive teamwork may have saved countless people from being wounded, maimed or killed in future violence. If ever an ounce of prevention was worth a pound of cure, this was that time.

A review of the list of armaments is enough to send chills down the spine of any decent-minded individual. At the Maywood address, there were a total of 38 weapons, including eight automatic machine guns, seven sawed-off shotguns, one semi-automatic Uzi machine gun, 20 handguns, 23 live hand grenades and numerous rounds of ammunition. At the Westchester home, suspected cocaine, $4,300 in cash, 13 guns and an undisclosed quantity of ammunition were confiscated.

Authorities reportedly said the two homes where the weapons were being kept were so-called "safe houses" used by gangs. It was also reported that officials felt the weapons were destined for delivery to a Chicago street gang. The Defender wants to stress that the weapons reportedly were fully-loaded.

Just think of the damage to society that could have been done if the 51 weapons and grenades had been delivered to and used by the street gangs. Bullets have no eyes. They do immeasurable damage when fired from a high-powered assault weapon held by a person who is so intent on killing a rival that the weapon-wielding fool doesn't care how many innocent bystanders will be hurt or killed in the process. The media have reported innumerable cases of infants, preschool children, senior citizens, and innocent adults being caught in such senseless shootings. Who is to explain to innocent victim's loved ones why his/her precious life was so heartlessly and unnecessarily extinguished?

There are other horror stories of high-powered weapons use such as the time when mentally unbalanced persons walk into a school, shopping center, fast-food restaurant or the like and opens fire helter-skelter.

Chicago Police Superintendent LeRoy Martin reportedly made a statement which the Defender thinks authorities and lawmakers should take into serious consideration: "All (the weapons) were created by the military as war weapons. They have only one purpose and that is to kill . . . they were never intended for civilian use. And here such weapons are, in the hands of people involved in criminal activity."

Martin's statement is so on target and in agreement with the Defender views of the matter that we at the Defender are strongly recommending that legislation pass appropriate laws to ban high-powered assault weapons and any ammunition made for them. Let's take a page from the Los Angeles' and Stockton, California book of wisdom on this issue. The city council of the two municipalities recently passed legislation to ban such weapons.

Readers may recall that a man recently used such a weapon to wound 30 children and a teacher and kill five youngsters on a school playground in the L.A., Stockton area. Let's not wait for such a tragedy to occur in Illinois. We don't need school children, police officers, or any other decent citizens ruthlessly slaughtered because of someone's indiscriminant use of such armaments. Ban the weapons throughout the state and, most importantly, enforce the ban. The Defender wants each citizen to support a ban because, as the old saying goes, "The life you save may be your own."●

THE 72d ANNIVERSARY OF U.S. CITIZENSHIP FOR PUERTO RICANS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I rise today to commemorate the 72d anniversary of the granting of U.S. citizenship to residents of Puerto Rico. On March 2, 1917, the "Act to provide a civil government for Puerto Rico, and for other purposes" was enacted into law. Since that time, Puerto Ricans have been U.S. citizens but have not enjoyed all of the rights and privileges that go with citizenship.

The people of Puerto Rico vote in Presidential primaries and send delegates to both the Republican and Democratic conventions. However, they have no vote in the general election. The more than 3.3 million U.S. citizens in Puerto Rico cannot elect two U.S. Senators like other citizens can. Most of our Federal laws apply to Puerto Rico including any requirements for military service.

On the anniversary of this important occasion, I renew my belief that true equality of citizenship for Puerto Rico residents means that Puerto Rico should be granted statehood. If Puerto Rico became a State, it would have a voice in the general election, two U.S. Senators, and at least five or six Members in the House of Representatives. Too often Puerto Rico receives the short end of important and severely needed Federal programs.

Recently, I met with the Governor of Puerto Rico, Rafael Hernandez Colon. He has recently asked Congress to sponsor a plebiscite on Puerto Rican political status. I believe that allowing Puerto Ricans to finally choose a definitive status for the island would have bipartisan support in the Congress. It also requires the consensus support of the key parties in Puerto Rico. Today, on the 72d anniversary of the granting of U.S. citizenship for Puerto Rico residents, I offer my cooperation and energies to work with Energy Committee Chairman JOHNSTON, his ranking member Senator MCCLURE, concerned colleagues on both sides of the aisle, and interested parties on the island of Puerto Rico in this endeavor.●

POVERTY AND DEVELOPMENT IN SOUTHERN AFRICA

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, the Carnegie Endowment has just released "Uprooting Poverty—The Second Carnegie Inquiry into Poverty and Development in Southern Africa." At a recent Carnegie conference, Senator

KENNEDY recently commented on the study and his position on United States policy toward South Africa. I thought my colleagues would be interested in reading Senator KENNEDY's remarks. I ask that the full text of Senator KENNEDY's statement and The Second Carnegie Inquiry into Poverty and Development in Southern Africa be included in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR EDWARD M. KENNEDY: "A NEW AMERICAN POLICY TOWARD APARTHEID"

Thank you, Karl, for that generous introduction. I also commend your tireless work not only in making this conference a success, but in making it a significant milestone on our journey to a more sensible policy toward South Africa and Southern Africa.

As I look out at this audience and see all the expertise and experience here to discuss this remarkable study, I cannot help but think, as President Kennedy might have said, "there is more wisdom about Southern Africa in this room than at any other time in our history—except when Helen Kitchen had lunch with Karl Beck last Tuesday."

We have all come to the Carnegie Endowment today, because South Africa continues to be a matter of intense interest and concern to the United States and to the American people. U.S. policy is a compelling issue for debate, not only in Congress and the executive branch in Washington but throughout the United States. If President Bush's pledge of a new breeze has meaning in our foreign relations, we will have a new and more realistic and long overdue policy toward apartheid and South Africa by our Government.

Given our own history, our deep involvement in the struggle against apartheid is not only understandable, but inevitable. No other country in the world outside South Africa—no other people in the world—has been as occupied and as pre-occupied with the issue of apartheid as the United States and the American people.

But there is another reason for our presence here today. Uprooting poverty—the final report of the second Carnegie inquiry into poverty and development in Southern Africa—is a landmark in social science and research. It will influence the politics and policies of the apartheid state itself, and it will have a profound and lasting effect on the lives of millions of people throughout Southern Africa.

This study documents the deprivation of the South African people in ways that cannot be ignored, even in Pretoria. Its findings destroy one of the fundamental myths at the heart of the apartheid system. I encountered that myth myself, on my second day in South Africa in 1985, when I met Pik Botha. I had spent the previous two nights and a day in Soweto.

"Yes," he said, "What you say in Soweto—the crowded shacks and the single-sex hostels—the conditions are very bad."

But, he went on, "You must remember that you are in Africa. Even with so-called Apartheid," he said, "the South African black is in better shape here than his counterparts in other African countries." He told me to go to Nairobi, Lagos and Khartoum. "Poverty is a fact of life in all Africa," he said. "But it is not as bad in South Africa."

Pik Botha was wrong then, he is wrong now, and this study proves it. As it shows, poverty in South Africa is as severe as poverty anywhere else in Africa. South African blacks endure even worse conditions, because of Apartheid, than many other Africans.

Take just one statistic in this study. For blacks in South Africa, infant mortality is higher than in many other African nations, including Botswana, Zimbabwe, Kenya, the Congo, and Zambia. If we look at rural regions in South Africa, the rate is even higher. In Venda, in the northern Transvaal, 10 of the 30 babies born alive during the year preceding the study died before their first birthday.

Other comparisons cannot be ignored. In measuring economic inequality, South Africa has the worst disparity of any of the 57 countries in the world for which data are available. When it comes to economic injustice, South Africa has the most shameful record in the world.

But uprooting poverty does much more than compile the statistics of injustice. It also explores the causes. It identifies some of the historic, pre-apartheid roots of deprivation, beginning with the fact of conquest and including the creation of the inhuman system of migratory labor, adopted long before apartheid itself was established.

Finally, this study identifies the cruel specifics of apartheid—the pass laws, the creation of artificial homelands, the group areas act, the forced removals—which make apartheid a daily living nightmare for black men, women and children in South Africa.

The authors of this study have shown the world the true magnitude of that suffering. Professor Ramphele and Doctor Wilson have held up a searing mirror to the ugly face of apartheid, and they deserve great credit for their achievement.

Francis Wilson follows the footsteps of his mother, the great historian of Southern Africa, Doctor Monica Wilson. Her work 20 years ago destroyed another myth of apartheid—as does her son's work today—by proving beyond any reasonable doubt that there were, in fact, Africans living throughout South Africa before the arrival of European settlers in the 17th century, and their appeal for justice today has even greater merit.

Doctor Ramphele, too, is well known to students of South Africa for her work and writing which have changed the mind and mentality of all South Africans, both blacks and whites. Even before uprooting poverty, her place in the history of her country was secure. Her enduring insights and commitment guarantee that she will continue to inform the debate. Her example will continue to inspire all those who cherish freedom and the goal of a free South Africa.

Above all, these two authors deserve credit for three powerful judgments in their work.

They say: "Poverty in South Africa is a profoundly political issue." They say: "Power lives at the heart of the problem of poverty in Southern Africa." They say: "An essential prerequisite for uprooting poverty in South Africa is a redistribution of political power."

These words must be heeded as uprooting poverty enters the international debate—in South Africa as well as in this country. The new and important focus on the misery inside South Africa must not distract us from the fundamental political challenge to end apartheid. That abhorrent system will not necessarily end by increasing black bank accounts or feeding black babies. It will end only when the majority of the people of South Africa have the political power to end it. It will end only when a total reorganization of the political relationships between blacks and whites has been accomplished.

Ending poverty, curing disease, easing suffering—are all important, and the international community should be contributing more resources and expertise to reach those goals.

But we must never adopt a limited agenda aimed at easing the economic plight of black South Africans without transforming their political plight too. It is long past time for political as well as economic power to be transferred from the minority to the majority.

Apartheid will only be ended with a clear, consistent, and concerted policy—of all nations working together to apply the full range of political, diplomatic and economic pressure against the South Africa regime.

That is why I support comprehensive sanctions. And so today, I take this opportunity to urge President Bush, as one of his first steps in foreign policy, to reverse the drift of the past 8 years, to withdraw America's opposition to sanctions in the United Nations Security Council, and to put our Government at long last where it belongs, at the forefront of a new worldwide effort against apartheid in South Africa. Above all, I hope that Congress and the new administration will end our divisions of the past 8 years on this vital issue, so that together, we can work to end apartheid, once and for all time.

Finally, I have an important duty to perform—to introduce one of the truly great leaders of the anti-apartheid movement in South Africa. For many years, Vusi Khanyile has worked tirelessly against apartheid. He has served as organizing Secretary of the Soweto Civic Association, Secretary of the Soweto Parents' Crisis Committee, and as a founder and chairman of the National Education Crisis Committee.

Last October, Vusi and two leaders from the United Democratic Front escaped detention and sought sanctuary in the American Consulate in Johannesburg. Nations and leaders throughout the world rallied to their support and called for their release, and also for the release of thousands more detained in South African jails.

Last October, the Government of South Africa bowed to Vusi's will. Today, because of the courage of hundreds of detainees who maintained their hunger strike, there is new hope that all the detainees may soon be free.

Vusi, you are a profile in courage and it is our privilege to welcome you to Washington.

THE SECOND CARNEGIE INQUIRY INTO POVERTY AND DEVELOPMENT IN SOUTHERN AFRICA

The Second Carnegie Inquiry into Poverty and Development in Southern Africa was initiated by Carnegie Corporation of New York in April of 1982. Based in South Africa at the University of Cape Town, it is directed by Dr. Francis Wilson, the distinguished economist, head of the School of Economics and of the Southern Africa Labour and Development Research Unit (SALDRU) at the School of Economics, a long-time opponent of apartheid.

The Inquiry has had three main objectives: (1) collection of up-to-date facts about poverty and the process of impoverishment among blacks in South Africa and surrounding states that are economically dependent upon South Africa; (2) Generation of public debate in South Africa and abroad about the causes, nature, and extent of black poverty in Southern Africa; and (3) stimulation of thinking and action on short-run and long-run strategies against poverty and on ways of facilitating equitable development in the region.

The recommendations for action, while analyzing the role of the state and having implications for government policy, are primarily addressed to nongovernmental institutions. The ultimate aim is to seek ways that a more just and democratic society can be shaped in South Africa.

The Inquiry is an interdisciplinary and cooperative fact-finding enterprise based primarily on field work and involving a network of scholars and professional persons in law, medicine, economics, religion, and other fields as well as community leaders, teachers, and social workers who have firsthand knowledge of poverty and the process of impoverishment. The intention has been to ensure the widest possible participation in the study from all segments and races in Southern Africa. More than 20 universities in the region have participated in the study.

The Inquiry is the most exhaustive survey and analysis of the causes and consequences of poverty in that region since the Corporation-financed study among whites in South Africa was carried out from 1927 to 1932. Popularly known as the Carnegie Poor White Study, it resulted in five volumes that stimulated action bringing the Afrikaner poor out of their isolated, rural conditions to become part of mainstream South African society. Ironically, it helped lead to the political empowerment of the Afrikaner community.

The current study focuses on a problem of obviously greater magnitude and complexity than did the Poor White Investigation. For one thing, there were not legal or political barriers to full participation by Afrikaners in South African society. Also, following the Poor White Study, industry and commerce collaborated with the State to foster the "unfettered development" of Afrikaner talent, something that is not expected to happen to blacks under the present leadership as a result of the Second Inquiry. On the other hand, the timing of the Inquiry's results, and its diagnostic and remedial thrust, may, it is hoped, make it a basis of policy in whatever government or regime succeeds the one in existence.

At the outset of the study, it was decided by Inquiry principals that there would be no single definition of poverty. Rather, the aim would be to find out what poverty means to different people in different settings. The primary indicator of poverty is level of wealth and earnings, but money is not sufficient to portray "the full dimensions of poverty". Poverty thus has been studied in relation to land use, the legal system, food and nutrition, health care, education and training, transport, housing, social welfare, and other "quality of life" indicators. It has been studied for its particular effects upon families, migrant workers, women, children, and the elderly. Not least, it has been studied in its relation to apartheid and to the political economy of the country as it has developed over several hundred years.

The Inquiry began in January 1980 with a 15-month period of extensive consultation and travel by Francis Wilson to assess the feasibility and role of the study. Out of these discussions the scope and decentralized structure of the Inquiry emerged. The research phase was launched in April 1982, involving a roundup of existing research and research in progress, the generation of new knowledge, and the identification of knowledge gaps. The research phase ended in the summer of 1985, although follow-up continues.

What has been intended is a national "mapping" of poverty and the process of impoverishment in South Africa. This work is already opening up whole new areas of scholarly exploration. As one observer put it, "I have no doubt that, whatever else may come out of the investigation, the detailed factual research on poverty that is has sponsored will justify its existence. For years to come the Carnegie papers will be mined for information."

Preliminary findings were presented at a conference on poverty and development held in Cape Town in April of 1984, for which more than 300 papers were presented by participants in the Inquiry. The conference also exhibited a collection of photographs of the southern African poor, entitled "The Cordoned Heart." A film festival taking as its theme "Signs of Hope" brought together information about development efforts in other countries. There was additionally a video workshop, a slide show, and an art exhibition.

The conference was part of an ongoing process that will result in a series of reports and public education efforts, both in South Africa and in the United States. It is very much the thinking of Inquiry leaders that the future shape of South African society will depend on the foundations that are laid down now for combating what Wilson calls "one of the most unequal distributions of national wealth in the world." The need to lay down the basis for a just and democratic system indeed is what the Inquiry is all about.

As part of the task of generating public debate about the Inquiry's findings and recommendations, Wilson and his colleagues launched an intensive education campaign in South Africa. The interim findings presented at the April 1984 conference created much comment and controversy in the Nationalist Party and other circles, provoking complaints in Parliament from President Botha that South Africa is being singled out and that the Inquiry would have done better to focus its attention on the rest of Africa where, he said (mistakenly) poverty is much worse. The press attention has been mainly in the English-language papers, but widespread coverage has also been given to the Inquiry in the Afrikaner and black press. Wilson and his associates on the study have traveled widely throughout southern Africa to make presentations before businessmen, church leaders, politicians, university faculty, and community groups to share with them the facts, analyses, and thinking about strategies and to stimulate independent thinking and action on the recommendations.

The public education effort in the United States begin in spring of 1986 with the publication of the interim report, South Africa: The Cordoned Heart, (W.W. Norton). The book was edited by the noted South African photographer, Omar Badsha, with a long introduction by Francis Wilson, more than 80 photographers exhibited at the conference on poverty, and short essays by the South African photographers, half of whom are black. Timed with the photography book was an exhibition of selected photographs held at the International Center of Photography in New York City in May 1986, after which the exhibition went on tour throughout the United States for two years. The exhibits have appeared mainly on university campuses and art centers. The travelling exhibition has been renewed for two additional years beginning January 1989.

The final "overview" report, Uprooting Poverty: The South African Challenge, synthesizes the findings and recommendations of all the Inquiry reports and monographs. Due to be published in the United States by W.W. Norton on March 17, 1989, it is co-authored by Francis Wilson and his colleague, Dr. Mamphela Ramphele, who was banned from 1977 to 1983. While in banishment in the northern Transvaal, she began the Ithuseng Community Health Center as a commitment to community development and individual action. She is one of the outstanding black leaders in South Africa working for peaceful change.

The 311 conference and 9 post-conference papers have been circulated to selected libraries in Africa, United States, and elsewhere. Some of the monographs have already been published separately in various journals.

Working group reports, scheduled for publication in 1989, thus far cover education, law, labor, and the church. Books are also planned on the reserves, the platteland, and metropolitan centers.

The present Inquiry is independent of all governmental bodies and political parties. It is financed wholly by Carnegie Corporation, which has contributed $515,000 toward the work, with offices and staff provided by the University of Cape Town.

SCIENCE CURRICULUM REFORMS PROPOSED

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, the United States is entering a period of great opportunity. For the last several years, the educational community in this country has been taking a critical look at the way we teach our young people science and mathematics. The results of these reviews have been very troubling to me. It was less than a month ago, for example, that a study of science and math performance in half a dozen countries put American 13-year-olds near or at the bottom.

How is this country going to be able to compete with our trading partners if we cannot produce the scientists and engineers necessary to make internationally competitive products? And if we cannot compete in the global economy, how are we going to provide good jobs for our citizens? Or generate the tax revenues to help clean the environment, fight crime, provide health care or defend this country? More is at stake here than whether Johnny can read or add or dissect a frog. The standard of living for all future generations is at risk.

On Thursday of last week, several of the Nation's most prestigious scientific organizations, including the American Association for the Advancement of Science, the National Science Foundation, IBM Corp., and the Carnegie Corp. of New York, issued a report titled "Project 2061" that examines the way we teach science and proposes changes in the goals and methods of science instruction. I realize the report will have its critics. Nevertheless, I would like to pay tribute to these organizations for taking the initiative here: Not only have they obviously thought very hard about science education and its problems, these organizations have undertaken an effort to come up with the solution.

Of course, Project 2061 may end up collecting dust like a lot of other reports that preceded it. I hope not. The difference here is that we finally may have the national attention that a task of this magnitude will need in order to reach fruition. The President and the Congress are both eager to make the U.S. educational system the best in the world. Numerous polls show that the American people support Federal Government initiatives to improve education.

For my part, I have introduced S. 134, a bill to establish congressional scholarships for science, mathematics, and engineering. Under this proposal, two high school seniors from every congressional district in the country would receive 4-year, $5,000 annual scholarships to study science, math, or engineering at the college of their choice. The concept of national science scholarships was endorsed by President Bush in his fiscal year 1990 budget proposal. I applaud the President's proposal and state for the record my willingness to work with him on this initiative.

No matter how important a message these congressional scholarships will send to the Nation's young people, they will not close the scientist gap. Clearly, as the Project 2061 demonstrates, the United States may have to develop new science curricula and methods for teaching them in order to produce more scientists and engineers as well as raise the science literacy of the general population. This is why initiatives like the Project 2061 are so important.

I ask that the article from last Friday's Washington Post on Project 2061 be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

SCIENCE-STUDY REFORM SOUGHT—AIM IS TO BROADEN ALL STUDENTS' SKILLS

(By Philip J. Hilts)

Several of the nation's largest and most prestigious scientific organizations yesterday announced the most ambitious effort yet to redesign schools to overcome the pervasive weakness of students in science and mathematics.

The program is even larger than the billion-dollar rewriting of science texts that occurred in the post-Sputnik years. It was announced by representatives from the American Association for the Advancement of Science, the National Science Foundation, International Business Machines Corp., the Carnegie Corp. of New York and participating school districts.

The plan is radical and authors acknowledge that it is risky because it abandons previous attempts to fix the ailing system simply by changing texts or training teachers.

Instead it seeks to develop a new approach to teaching, including possibly eliminating regular subjects and ending standardized testing. Instead, teaching may consist largely of guiding students through projects that include not only science and mathematics, but also forays into related aspects of literature, economics, history and other subjects.

"We can't continue our industrial progress at the level of skills that are coming in with the new work force," said William O. Baker, former chairman of American Telephone & Telegraph Co.'s Bell Laboratories and co-chairman of the project. "The old notion that America would always find a way, that the gifted and talented, as few as they are, would nevertheless see us through is now suspect."

He said the idea in redesigning whole school systems is not to focus on gifted students and special science classes, but to teach all students a substantial amount from all areas of science and technology.

The group has spent four years writing a detailed, 100-page outline of the kinds of knowledge about science and nature that a student should have upon leaving high school.

The group announced at a news conference yesterday the beginning of another four-year phase in which teams of teachers from about a dozen school districts in five states, led by the AAAS group, will outline new curricula, texts and student schedules.

In a third phase, these outlines will be taken by states and local school districts, modified to fit local conditions and installed in a number of schools. It would require all teachers to adapt and would reorganize the schedules of all students if it is adopted.

The first two phases, which will cost about $10 million, will be paid for by the AAAS, NSF, IBM, Carnegie, the Mellon Foundation and participating states. If the reform is adopted by schools, the cost will be borne by the federal and state governments and local school districts.

The plan is called Project 2061 for the year when Halley's Comet returns. The project was begun in 1985, the year of the comet's last approach. Project leaders said they hope the reforms will be widely adopted in time to help children who will live to see the comet's return in 2061.

The plan "is a rallying point for leapfrogging the traditional piece-by-piece teaching of literacy, and something about science, and something about technology, and something about numeracy. If you acquire the knowledge in [the basic outline], and learn to read, you will be literate," Baker said.

One of the key points in the plan said F. James Rutherford, director of the project, is to simplify schooling. He said schools now try to teach far too much. "This is an effort to move schools away from their fixation with teaching mountains and mountains" of details. He said it is not even clear that regular textbooks will be needed.

Instead, the plan envisions students taking up to a dozen or so substantial topics over their 13 years from kindergarten to high school graduation, and exploring them fairly exhaustively and from many perspectives.

For example, one topic might be evolution, and it would examine not only biological evolution, but also the evolution of political systems.

The atmosphere and weather might be another topic, which would consider not only the physics of molecules in the atmosphere, and the movement of energy around the Earth, and the geophysics of the Earth, but also the economic and social impacts of climate and weather.

The subject might be taken up in early grades with measurements of rain and collection of snowflakes and might in later grades address the probabilities involved in predicting weather, Rutherford said.

The teams that will now begin designing the detailed models will total 25 people, including 20 teachers, three school administrators and two university experts. The teachers will devote about three or four days a month and two summers to the project.

The school districts collaborating on the project are those of San Diego and San Francisco in California; four in San Antonio, Tex; two in Georgia; one in Wisconsin, and two other urban Eastern districts not yet named.

REFORMING SCIENCE EDUCATION

Excerpts from "Project 2061, Science for All Americans," published by the American Association for the Advancement of Science in Washington.

THE PROBLEM

"Most Americans are not scientifically literate. . . . U.S. students rank near the bottom in science and mathematics" in the world.

"The present science textbooks and methods of instruction, far from helping, often actually impede progress toward scientific literacy. They often emphasize the learning of answers more than the exploration of questions, memory at the expenses of critical thought, bits and pieces of information instead of understanding in context, recitation over argument, reading in lieu of doing."

"Few elementary school teachers have even a rudimentary education in science and mathematics, and many junior and senior high school teachers in science and mathematics do not meet reasonable standards of preparation in those fields."

THE SOLUTION

(Already completed) "Establish a conceptual base . . . by defining the knowledge, skills and attitudes all students should acquire as a consequence of their total school experience, from kindergarten through high school."

(Just beginning) "Teams of educators are transforming [that outline of knowledge] into blueprints for action. The main purpose of the second phase of the project is to produce a variety of curriculum models that school districts and states can use as they undertake to reform the teaching of science. . . ."

(Beginning four years from now) Bring together "scientific societies, educational organizations and institutions . . . in a nationwide effort to turn phase II blueprints into educational practice."●

MEXICO AND DRUGS

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, the State Department yesterday released its annual International Narcotics Control Strategy Report. This congressionally-mandated document provides us the basis for subsequent debate on the progress made by specific countries.

In advance of any such debate, I want to call the Senate's attention to the section dealing with Mexico. While the news on controlling the drug menace is never good enough, the report with respect to Mexico is positive and encouraging.

As the summary says:

Mexico expanded the scope of opium and marijuana eradication programs, while taking steps to improve operational efficiency. Cocaine seizures rose sharply. Still, Mexico remained the largest single country source for heroin, the second largest source for marijuana and a leading transit point for cocaine. Newly elected President Carlos Salinas de Gortari has made anti-narcotics programs a national priority for his new government, and the Attorney General's budget for 1989 will exceed $26 million, up from $19.5 million in 1987. A strong, positive tone for bilateral relations was set in an early meeting between then President-elect Bush and Mr. Salinas, and the U.S. Government, anticipating continued improvements in the program, is prepared to cooperate with Salinas on these enhancements. However, U.S. officials are concerned about the inhibiting effects of corruption throughout the program. U.S. enforcement agencies continue to monitor instances of drug related corruption within Mexico.

Mr. President, I ask that the full text of the report's section on Mexico be reprinted in the RECORD, along with a related news article from the February 27 Washington Post.

The material follows:

INTERNATIONAL NARCOTICS CONTROL STRATEGY REPORT, MARCH 1989

MEXICO

A.1. Status of Illicit Narcotics Production and Trafficking

Mexico is a major producer of opium poppy and cannabis and continues to be a primary source of heroin and marijuana entering the United States. Current estimates by U.S. officials are that 1988 net production from Mexico totaled 45-55 metric tons of opium and 5,655 metric tons of marijuana. Data reported by the Mexican Attorney General's office indicate improvements in eradication, including an approximate 25 percent expansion of opium destruction, that offset increased cultivation. Net production levels, after eradication and seizures, were approximately the same as 1987 for opium while net marijuana production decreased. Additionally, traffickers increasingly use Mexico as a transit country for shipping cocaine from South America to the United States.

The narcotics control program in Mexico includes aerial and manual eradication, interdiction, bilateral law enforcement directed at curtailing trafficker operations, military involvement in narcotics eradication, and efforts to increase public awareness. Under the de la Madrid administration, which ended its term on November 30, the government maintained its commitment to eradicate illicit drug crops and cooperated with U.S. law enforcement agencies in the interdiction of narcotics.

U.S. officials, noting the improvements in several areas in 1988, believed the effectiveness of the joint eradication and interdiction operations needs to be improved even more in 1989.

Publicly acknowledging drug trafficking as a grave threat to health and national security, new President Carlos Salinas de Gortari has made the defeat of narcotics trafficking a national priority. He has created an enlarged and restructured Deputy Attorney General's Office with specialized units devoted solely to fighting drugs and has ordered a 100-percent increase in anti-drug personnel and resources. The campaign against narcotics trafficking is administered by Attorney General Enrique Alvarez Del Castillo.

The aerial eradication program is the most effective current means of diminishing the production of opium and cannabis; improved enforcement is needed to curb trafficking in heroin, marijuana and cocaine. In 1988 the Office of the Attorney General (PGR) increased the size of its eradication air fleet and took significant steps to improve the efficiency of its anti-narcotics operations.

Despite severe domestic economic problems and a sharp cutback in government spending for most other programs, the PGR budget for drug eradication climbed from $19.5 million in 1987 to $23.1 million in 1988. A $26.0 million budget is projected for 1989. Increased Mexican funding, plus U.S. financial assistance, was instrumental in helping the PGR to eradicate more hectares of opium poppy and marijuana in 1988 than in 1987 and 1986, giving confidence to its projections of an upward, sustained trend line for future years.

The Mexican Army is also involved in narcotics eradication and interdiction with approximately 25,000 Army personnel (25 percent of total troops) regularly engaged in manual eradication, and up to 50,000 troops involved in anti-narcotics operations during peak growing/harvesting periods. Since late 1986, the Mexican Navy has cooperated with the U.S. Coast Guard and other U.S. agencies in carrying out drug interdiction efforts against suspected traffickers in Mexican territorial waters. The 9,000-member Mexican Marine Corps has jurisdiction for anti-drug operations extending approximately six miles inland from the coast. New Defense Minister General Antonio Riviello Bazan has pledged that the Mexican military will intensify drug eradication and interdiction.

Mexico's 2,000 mile border with the United States makes the country a natural point of origin and transshipment for drugs. Severe domestic economic problems and intimidation by traffickers have motivated farmers to grow illegal narcotics crops; financial rewards for poor farmers from drug crops are far above those possible from growing legal crops. Traffickers provide peasant growers with credit and seeds, and pay in full for the illicit crop immediately after the harvest.

Throughout 1988, senior Mexican officials increasingly expressed concern over the threat that narcotics trafficking organizations could pose to government authority. Many, however, reiterated that drug consumption, primarily in the United States, fuels drug production in Mexico. The media and the general public also appear to be growing more aware of the threat narcotics trafficking and abuse present.

Terrorism does not exist in Mexico in the traditional sense of an alliance between drug traffickers and political insurgents. Frequent violent confrontations do occur, however, between drug traffickers and the police, military, and rival traffickers, and armed reprisals against anti-drug personnel and helicopters are increasing. Four major seizures of large weapons shipments during 1988 highlighted an increasingly volatile and dangerous situation. These shipments consisted of state-of-the-art weapons and other paramilitary equipment reportedly destined for Colombia. The government moved rapidly to arrest both Mexican and Colombian nationals involved with the shipments.

Corruption continues to undermine effective drug law enforcement. The emergence in 1988 of an increasing number of Colombian traffickers within Mexico, involved primarily with facilitating the transshipment of cocaine to the United States, has contributed to an already complex situation. There is little information to measure the degree to which the government addressed high-level drug-related corruption during 1988. President Salinas has vowed to come down hard on corruption, especially by public officials. Although not linked to drug trafficking, the January 10, 1989, arrest of the leadership of the powerful Petroleum Workers Union was an encouraging demonstration of strength on the part of President Salinas. The following statements respond to the requirements of Section 2013 of P.L. 99-570: (a) There is no evidence to suggest that the government, as a matter of government policy, has encouraged narcotics production or trafficking; and (b) No senior officials of the government have been indicted on drug-related charges since the last 2013 report.

Mexican financial institutions, which are governed by strict financial privacy laws, are not viewed as major conduits for large scale money laundering, but have been used to facilitate the laundering of narcotics proceeds. Deposits (normally U.S. dollars) are automatically converted to pesos, which could continue to suffer rapid and unpredictable devaluations. Mexican commercial banks, all but two of which are nationalized, do not provide information to U.S. officials on their activities. The Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty (MLAT), once ratified by the U.S. Senate, could provide a useful framework for law enforcement cooperation on money laundering and access to bank records. For the most part, narcotics-generated funds are invested in real estate and attractive commercial ventures in Mexico or in the U.S. and other countries. Because Mexican currency exchange houses and commercial business operations are less stringently regulated than commercial banks and they can deal in currency without conversion into pesos, drug traffickers are expected to increase their heretofore limited use of them to launder money. In late 1988, the new Mexican Attorney General announced that his office will investigate money laundering, continue to confiscate traffickers' resources, and strengthen penalties for drug trafficking.

A.2. Accomplishments in 1988

Mexican authorities arrested over 13,000 persons on drug-related charges in 1988 including major traffickers Miguel Quintero Paez, Filemon Medina, Juan Lizarraga, Juan Jose Quintero Payan, Jose Pineda Trinidad, Juan Frank Garcia and Hugo Etienne Marin.

Drug traffickers Rafael Caro Quintero and Ernesto Fonseca Carrillo, among other defendants, were convicted on drug trafficking charges by a Mexican court in September. Caro Quintero received a 34-year sentence and Fonseca Carrillo, 11 years. Verdicts from their trial in Guadalajara for the 1985 kidnapping and murder of DEA Special Agent Enrique Camarena are expected in 1989. The court case related to the 1986 detention of DEA Special Agent Victor Cortez by Jalisco state police continues, and should also be resolved in 1989.

The PGR reported destroying 2,737 hectares of opium poppy and 3,997 hectares of marijuana in 1988, compared to 2,200 hectares of opium poppy and 3,750 hectares of cannabis in 1987. This is an increase of 25 percent in opium poppy eradication and 6.6 percent in marijuana destruction over PGR figures for 1987. (These values are midpoint ranges found in the data tables.)

The PGR verification program reported that 40 percent of the hectarage sprayed had been surveyed and of that hectarage the destruction rate was 98 percent. Eradication totals increased in 1988 because of improved aircraft maintenance levels, reduced aircraft on ground time (AOG, i.e., for major overhauls and major repairs rather than for routine maintenance), improved spare parts ordering, a greater number of flight hours logged by the PGR, additional PGR aircraft committed to aerial eradication, and better pilot retention.

In the state of Michoacan, the PGR continued a special project in which federal and state government enforcement personnel manually eradicated narcotic crops with U.S.-supplied backpack sprayers in areas inaccessible to aerial spraying. Aerial spraying continues to account for the majority of illicit crops destroyed.

DEA participation in Operation Vanguard, the bilateral reconnaissance and eradication verification effort, was suspended by DEA Headquarters in April, pending a reevaluation of the program. Future U.S. participation in the Mexican verification program is currently being reviewed in Washington. In mid-1988, DEA instituted a program to assist in estimating crop cultivation, determining methods of production, and identifying end-product ratios (i.e., opium gum to morphine to heroin).

In June, a PGR/Embassy exchange of letters provided the funding for a new aviation maintenance contract. Bell Helicopter Services, Inc. (BHIS), a subsidiary of Bell Helicopter-Textron, Inc., succeeded E-Systems in providing aviation maintenance services in support of the PGR air fleet. The total value for the first 12 months of the contract is estimated to be $10.4 million. The contract authorizes maintenance for up to 93 PGR aircraft.

The PGR set an aircraft availability rate goal of 70 percent for 1988 and the air fleet averaged 67.3 percent availability. The lower figure is due to a greater number of aircraft down for routine servicing and repairs, as the PGR has logged almost 5,000 more flight hours in 1988 than for the same period in 1987. Failures in obsolete radio equipment installed in the PGR fleet (as well as routine maintenance) also contributed significantly to aircraft downtime. The twelve new Bell 206b helicopters purchased by the PGR with its own funds in 1987 were fully operational during 1988. This allowed the PGR to increase the number of spray/support helicopter pairs from 14 to 19.

In February, the PGR successfully completed a 90-day, INM-funded accelerated training program to fill helicopter pilot vacancies. While all other government employees remained under a wage freeze, PGR eradication campaign personnel received a significant pay increase in April. At midyear, all pilot vacancies had been filled. By December, however, continued inflation and no additional salary raises caused some pilots and technical personnel to leave for higher wages with commercial airlines. Given the danger factor, this in-out trend is likely to continue unless salary increases keep better pace with inflation.

The U.S. and the PGR worked together in 1988 to upgrade physical facilities and support equipment at selected PGR air bases and to field test herbicides and spray equipment to increase the effectiveness of eradication operations. In 1988, three additional field advisors were hired.

The PGR reported seizing 15,363 kg of cocaine, 278 tons of dried marijuana, 158 kg of opiates, 71 kg of heroin, 1,899 land vehicles, 27 aircraft, 16 boats, and 2,649 assorted firearms in the anti-drug campaign in 1988. The PGR also reported dismantling eight heroin labs and one cocaine lab, and arresting 13,135 individuals on drug-related charges during the same period. Because most drug labs in Mexico are small kitchens or rudimentary back yard contrivances, they are difficult to discover. Although a few cocaine laboratories have been found in the past, we have no evidence that extensive refining occurs.

According to the Mexican military, it manually eradicated 6,781 hectares (84,370 fields) of opium poppy and 8,785 hectares (74,216 fields) of cannabis in 1988. U.S. officials are unable to verify these claims which, when combined with reported PGR eradication totals, equal or exceed U.S. estimates of total cultivation. Thus, these figures are not included in the INCSR data tables. The Mexican military does not permit civilian (Embassy or PGR) scrutiny of its official activities. The Mexican Army also reported confiscating 7,729 kg of cocaine and 15 metric tons of marijuana during 1988. The Mexican Navy/Marine Corps reports having confiscated 47,051 kg of marijuana and 60.2 kg of cocaine during the same period.

INM-funded training by U.S. Coast Guard and DEA teams will assist in enhancing Mexican law enforcement capability to interdict illicit drug shipments and narcotics traffickers.

Various Mexican public and private institutions involved in prevention and treatment programs have adopted a zero tolerance approach to drug problems. Jointly funded by USAID/Mexico and a Mexican social service agency, a pilot program to combat the use of drugs in Ciudad Juarez carried out an attitude survey among the public, completed prevalence studies in public schools and in-bond plants (maquiladoras), aired professional antiabuse messages in the media and movie theaters, established a community drug hotline, created a job bank for ex-addicts, and opened information and counselling services for public school students and factory workers. Field work for the 1988 Mexican Ministry of Health (MOH) National Household Drug Abuse Survey, partially financed by INM, was completed in June. A final report is expected in mid-1989.

In October, 1988, the government purchased a radar system from a U.S. firm to detect and help in the interdiction of aircraft suspected of transporting narcotics northwards across Mexico's southern border (Belize and Guatemala). The Mexican Air Force will operate the system and develop an interdiction capability, which is not expected to be operational before late 1989. These actions, directed toward Mexico's southern border, are appropriate for targeting the significant amounts of cocaine transiting Mexico to the U.S. from South America. Nevertheless, the U.S. government continues to urge the GOM to undertake counter narcotics activities with Operation Alliance on our mutual border.

As indicated in previous reports under Section 2013 of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986, the government, for reasons of sovereignty, has declined to grant open-ended or unrestricted rights to the U.S. Customs Service to cross the Mexican border in pursuit of suspect aircraft. Various alternatives have been proposed by both sides without resolution. Efforts will continue to be made with the new senior Mexican law enforcement officials to persuade them to participate in initiatives, including under Operation Alliance, to halt the flow of drugs across the border.

A.3. Plans, Programs and Timetables

Given the strong anti-narcotics statements by President Salinas and his cabinet, further improvements in Mexican anti-narcotices efforts are anticipated. Increased liaison at all civilian levels is expected. U.S. officials are particularly encouraged by Salinas' creation of a new Deputy Attorney General's Office for Narcotics Matters. This new entity has four main sub-sections: Narcotics Investigation; Psychotropic and Drug Material Processing Control; Anti-narcotics Production Campaign; and International Relations.

The U.S. Embassy will provide procedural guidance to the PGR when the U.S.-funded BHSI aviation maintenance contract comes up for renewal in June, 1989. The Embassy will work with the maintenance contractor in 1989 to raise the PGR aircraft availability rate to 70 percent. Five new Bell 206b helicopters, purchased with PGR insurance funds in late 1988, will join the air fleet in early 1989 to replace helicopters destroyed in the anti-narcotics campaign.

Such improvements should enable the PGR to eradicate at least 20 percent more hectares of illicit crops in 1989 than it did in 1988. The U.S. will assist the PGR in formulating an effective drug eradication plan, emphasizing the achievement of the proper mix of Bell 206b and Bell 212 spray aircraft for maximum advantage. In 1989, INM funding will provide sufficient aviation fuel, herbicides, tools, and equipment to maintain the serial eradication program. Funds will also be used to maintain and upgrade PGR air bases and support equipment under a joint plan. In addition to the Michoacan manual eradication program, the government has stated its intention to undertake additional manual eradication programs in other key areas of Mexico.

A Letter Of Agreement (LOA) will be negotiated with the government in 1989 to develop an aerial survey project to determine better the extent of drug cultivation in Mexico. At least one (and hopefully three) PGR aircraft will be modified as photographic platforms with INM funds under the project.

The U.S. will also work with the government in 1989 to provide training in narcotics-related law enforcement and intelligence collection for Mexican law enforcement officials, to reduce the supplies of drugs that reach the United States either from or through Mexico, and to establish a precursor chemicals monitoring program. DEA's Operation Greenbelt, aimed at collecting more cultivation and production data, should be fully operational throughout 1989.

The U.S. will continue to assist the GOM in the development of community-based narcotics demand reduction programs. The Ciudad Juarez drug abuse prevention program will run through September, 1989, and be replicated in other Mexican cities. Results of the National Household Drug Abuse Survey will be published and disseminated by mid-year.

The U.S. has negotiated a Letter Of Agreement, which will comply with provisions of the Chiles Amendment. Mexico is party to the 1961 Single Convention on Narcotics, as well as the 1972 Protocol. Mexico is a signatory to the new United Nations Convention Against Illicit Trafficking.

The United Nations Fund for Drug Abuse Control (UNFDAC) has agreed to provide $15 million to Mexico, in return for matching funds from the government, in order to support a technical assistance program for rural integrated development in the most poverty-ridden areas of the drug growing states of Oaxaca, Guerrero and Michoacan. A master plan to be submitted by the government will contain its eradication schedule.

A.4. Adequacy of Legal and Law Enforcement Measures

Regarding the requirements of Section 2013 of P.L. 99-570, the government does not as a matter of policy encourage or facilitate the production or distribution of illegal drugs. The government has taken legal steps to eliminate bribery and other forms of public corruption. The administration of President de la Madrid created a Comptroller General's office to oversee the conduct of government employees and established comptroller offices in various government agencies to receive complaints. A new code of ethics was promulgated, which included the requirement for senior officials to declare annually their assets or changes in assets. These measures probably curbed some abuses, especially compared with the excesses during the two previous administrations, but it is unclear whether the level of narcotics-related corruption has diminished, either in absolute terms or in its impact on programs. With regard to enforcement of laws which deal with corruption, as noted in Section A.2, the extent to which the government may have addressed high-level corruption in 1988 is unclear. President Salinas has, however, vowed to come down hard on corruption by public officials. Mexico signed a Chiles Agreement on February 23, 1989.

In December of 1987, Mexico ratified the Mutual Legal Assistance Treaty (MLAT) which has long been sought by the U.S., but the U.S. Senate has not yet given its advice and consent to ratification. The MLAT could provide a basis for improving bilateral cooperation on criminal matters, including investigation and prosecution of narcotics-related crimes.

Statutes against drug trafficking are sound, but their enforcement is less satisfactory. The collection and use of evidence continues to be rudimentary, no nationwide criminal identification system exists, forensic capabilities are outmoded and police communication links are limited. Developing cases solely against Mexican money launderers is not foreseen in the immediate future because of the lack of investigative and prosecutorial resources. U.S. Customs plans to work with DEA and the IRS to focus on drug-related money laundering investigations.

The Mexican Constitution (Article 27) permits the government to confiscate and redistribute land not used for socially acceptable purposes, including lands used for drug crops. Based on a 1987 administrative initiative permitting the seizure of drug traffickers' property at the beginning, rather than at the end, of the legal process, the seizure of traffickers' assets continued during 1988.

Mexico continues to be very cooperative in expelling or deporting large numbers of non-Mexican fugitives wanted in the United States. Generally, these are U.S. citizens, such as drug trafficker Leonard Swirda who was deported in 1988, but we have also received third country nationals through this process.

Return of fugitives under the bilateral extradition treaty, a process far less efficient than deportation or expulsions, continues to be rare. In the last year, the government extradited accused. West German drug trafficker Veronica Kiera Wahl to the U.S. over a competing West German request, and court proceedings concerned the extradition of accused drug trafficker Daniel Fowlie, while slow, have nonetheless been successful to date. However, during the same period, Mexico refused the extradition of convicted terrorist William Morales.

A.5. Domestic Drug Abuse in Mexico

While still limited, increased attention to drug abuse issues has been noted in the media during 1988. Accurate drug abuse information is still unavailable in Mexico. The results of the 1988 National Household Drug Abuse Survey should significantly fill this data gap. Drug treatment centers in Mexico continue to report that common inhalants, such as gasoline and paint thinner, are the primary sources of abuse. Marijuana follows in popularity. Patterns of drug abuse vary by region and by urban versus rural local and are drawn along socioeconomic lines. Cocaine is available to more affluent youths and adults. Heroin abuse reportedly is only a problem in the U.S./Mexico border region. Major resort areas form pockets of drug abuse. The majority of heroin and marijuana production in Mexico, however, is destined for U.S. rather than local consumption. In contrast to the past, the Mexican public is increasingly being alerted by public organizations to the threat of drug dependence.

B.1 Nature of Illicit Drug Production

Small-scale farmers continue to be backbone of illegal opium poppy and marijuana drug production in Mexico. The processing and transportation of the final products are, however, in the hands of large organizations which have controlled the Mexican illegal narcotics trade for decades. Some traffickers have taught farmers more advanced growing techniques, such as using irrigation and improved seeds and fertilizers to increase and enhance yields. Nevertheless, in many rural areas the cultivation of opium poppy and marijuana remains unchanged over the past forty years. The increasingly prevalent practice of planting small, widely dispersed cultivations has made aerial eradication increasingly dangerous and difficult. Growers have also responded to the application of aerial herbicides by harvesting mature sprayed plants or washing all plants with water immediately following spraying.

In recent years, traffickers have encouraged the production of illicit crops in non-traditional growing areas, resulting in some marijuana cultivation in every Mexican state. Opium poppy, traditionally grown only in the tri-state region of Sinaloa, Chihuahua and Durango, is now also found extensively in the states of Michoacan, Nayarit, Guerrero, Oaxaca and Chiapas.

Both black tar heroin and the traditional Mexican brown variety are still produced in Mexico. According to Drug Abuse Warning Network (DAWN) statistics, the higher purity and lower price of black tar heroin has resulted in increased hospital emergency admissions, as well as overdose fatalities, in the United States.

B.2. Factors Affecting Production

The escalating cost of living and widespread unemployment and underemployment in Mexico have contributed to the attractiveness of drug ventures. Although inflation has been reduced from 169 percent in 1987 to about 52 percent in 1988 as a result of the government's economic solidarity pact, many Mexicans continue to experience real economic hardship. The cultivation, distribution and resale of illicit crops provide an attractive economic alternative.

Mexico produces some chemicals that are diverted to the refining of heroin from opium.

B.3. Maximum Achievable Reductions

The PGR makes no annual drug cultivation or production estimates. The government maintains that to do so, the total amount under cultivation would have to be known accurately, which, they believe, is not possible. Gross production has been estimated by U.S. officials. Government drug eradication policy is to eliminate opium poppy and cannabis cultivation wherever found. Given the size and geography of the nation, limits on available resources, and the current extent of drug crops in both non-traditional and traditional growing regions, this is an ambitious and extremely difficult goal.

PGR 1988 eradication figures show that 2,504 to 2,971 hectares of opium poppy (2,737 midpont) and 3,997 hectares of marijuana were destroyed. (The opium variable is field size, which range from .056 to .094 hectares.) Based on these totals, and the percentage of increase over 1987, U.S. officials estimate that the PGR can eradicate as much as 3,250 hectares of opium poppy and 4,796 hectares of cannabis in 1989, a 20 percent increase over 1988 results. Reductions anticipated for 1990 are 4,278 hectares of opium poppy and 5,755 hectares of cannabis, a further 20 percent increase over 1989.

B.4. Methodology for Estimates

Mexican officials, including the new President, Attorney General and Defense Minister, have publicly expressed their commitment to improve efforts and results against drug traffickers. It is therefore anticipated that the PGR will be able to eradicate 20 percent more hectares in 1989 than it did in 1988. Projections for 1989 are also premised on the assumptions that AOG time will be minimized, the spare parts ordering system will function properly, and PGR aircraft availability and pilot retention rates will remain at optimum levels.

Weight reductions of illicit crops are based on a yield of one metric ton of opium for each 100 hectares of opium poppy and 1.13 metric tons of marijuana for each hectare of cannabis cultivation.

MEXICO, U.S. ENVOY CITE ANTIDRUG GAINS AS "CERTIFICATION" NEARS

(By William Branigin)

MEXICO CITY, February 27.—With the U.S. Senate scheduled to begin the "certification" process Wednesday on Mexico's performance in combating drug trafficking, the Mexican government and the U.S. ambassador here are claiming major successes by the three-month-old government of President Carlos Salinas de Gortari.

In a rare briefing after the signing of a bilateral agreement on cooperation in the war on drugs last week, U.S. Ambassador Charles J. Pilliod Jr. praised the Mexican government for what he said was a "remarkable" and "quite impressive" increase in its antinarcotics efforts.

In a separate interview, Mexico's deputy attorney general in charge of fighting the narcotics trade, Javier Coello Trejo, listed achievements since Dec. 1 that include the arrests of 1,617 people for drug offenses, eradication of 2,162 acres of opium poppy and marijuana plants and seizure of 70 pounds of pure heroin, 92 tons of marijuana and 2.2 tons of cocaine base.

The State Department is to release its annual report Wednesday for the congressional certification hearings on whether or not Mexico and other countries are cooperating fully with the United States in fighting the drug trade.

Under a 1986 law, decertification of a country in which narcotics are produced or transshipped would require the U.S. government to cut foreign aid—in Mexico's case about $15 million a year in assistance for a drug-eradication program—and vote against loans by multilateral institutions.

Last year, the Senate voted 63 to 27 to decertify Mexico, but the move was killed in the House where Speaker Jim Wright (D-Tex.) shared the Reagan administration's view that such sanctions threatened larger bilateral interests.

Regardless of the outcome, the annual hearings are a painful, infuriating process for Mexico, which views the deliberations as U.S. interference in its internal affairs. This year, the Mexican government seems determined to take a more detached view, but resentment still crops up.

In an interview Friday, Coello Trejo said he respected and would not judge the legal procedures of a friendly country, "although obviously I don't believe that the legislature of one country should judge the actions of another."

He said the government was not worried about the outcome of certification and would continue to fight drug trafficking regardless. "The fight is to the death," he said, "because it concerns the well-being of Mexicans and the health of our children." He added that he doubted Mexico would be decertified anyway, "because the efforts of Mexico in this fight are strong and substantial."

Moreover, Coello Trejo said, "we are not fighting against drug trafficking because of certification, but because the conviction of Mexico is to put an end to this cancer that fundamentally affects Mexico and the whole of humanity."

A 40-year-old lawyer whose toughness on crime earned him a reputation as the "iron prosecutor" in the attorney general's office from 1971 to 1982, Coello Trejo said Salinas has created a new antinarcotics division manned by 1,200 federal police. He said 1989 funding for the antidrug effort has been raised to a record $53 million, which he said would help pay for the increased personnel, higher salaries, more arms, vehicles and helicopters and a new land-based and aerial radar system to try to stop cocaine flights from South America.

Among the recent successes of Mexico's antidrug campaign, Coello Trejo said, was the arrest in Mexico Feb. 20 of Giuseppe Ponsiglione, alias Pino Catania, an Italian said to represent Colombian cocaine kingpin Pablo Escobar. Ponsiglione, who was convicted of involvement in the "French Connection" heroin-trafficking ring years ago in New York, was arrested along with a Mexican and two Colombian pilots on charges of trying to smuggle 1,430 pounds of cocaine into the United States. The cocaine was seized.

Last month, police in Ciudad Juarez arrested Gilberto Ontiveros Lucero, alias El Grenas, on charges of trying to smuggle six tons of marijuana across the border. Ontiveros, allegedly an accomplice of Ponsiglione and a top Mexican drug lord, had been arrested on drug charges in 1986, but served only two years of a 20-year sentence before allegedly bribing a judge to free him.

According to Coello Trejo, at least 35 drug rings have been broken up under the current administration.

In Washington, however, the Mexican commitment to the war on drugs has come under some suspicion because of the appointment to top posts of certain officials suspected of past or present links to drug traffickers. The government insists there is no evidence of any such connections, although one such implicated official, Miguel Nazar Haro, was forced to resign last week as the new Mexico City police intelligence chief. Government officials attributed the move to complaints in Mexico that he had been responsible for human rights abuses in the 1970s.

Despite the concerns about some of Salinas' appointments, a well-in-formed U.S. official expressed optimism about the pace of Mexican antidrug activities in recent weeks.

"We're pleased with what we see," the official said. He said that unlike the previous administration of president Miguel de la Madrid, the new government had yet to "shut off" any of the investigative efforts in Mexico of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

The official also said he detected a new concern in the current administration about a "serious erosion of the effectiveness of some Mexican institutions," notably the military and the Federal Judicial Police. The official said Mexican authorities quietly were taking steps to reduce drug-related official corruption, the existence of which the government is loath to admit in public.

Ambassador Pilliod, a Reagan administration political appointee with two years here, on Friday discounted reports of high-level drug-related corruption in Mexico, "A lot of those reports came out of individuals in the field," he said, "Very seldom did those reports originate from official sources in the United States." Often, he said, such accounts came from arested drug traffickers, "who made statements that were not corroborated, yet [were] reported by members of the press."

Asked about criticism of the Mexican military, which has been accused in the past of providing protection for some drug operations, Pilliod said, "I don't think the criticism came out of this office." He said the current Mexican defense secretary was "showing the same determination" to fight the drug trade as his predecessor, Gen. Juan Arevalo Gardoqui.

Regarding this week's Senate proceedings, Pilliod said, "I don't visualize Mexico being decertified with the efforts that they've put out in the drug area." He added, "There's no reason for it. They're working with us." He praised current U.S.-Mexican antidrug cooperatiion as "closer and more supportive than we've seen at any time in the past."●

THE SAVINGS AND LOAN CRISIS

● Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, among the most pressing issues facing this Nation is the crisis in the savings and loan industry. Clearly, there is no simple cure-all solution to this very complex problem. Indeed, the final rescue package will likely incorporate a variety of proposals to address not only the short-term need to recapitalize the FSLIC and manage insolvent thrifts, but also the more basic need for regulatory reform to ensure this problem never occurs again.

Mr. President, as Congress investigates this matter, and evaluates the Bush administration's rescue proposal, I would like to share the perspective of one individual who has viewed the financial services industry as both an insider and an outsider. Georgetown University distinguished lecturer, Charles C. Ellis, has been familiar with corporate finance since 1946, when he served as controller for the Armstrong Cork Co. in Pennsylvania. Since 1953, he has served in a variety of financial executive positions with several major corporations, including Ford Motor Co., RCA and the Irving Trust Co. He currently serves on the board of directors of 13 major corporations. Prior to beginning his corporate career, Dr. Ellis earned an associate bachelors degree from Juniata College, a masters of business administration from Harvard University, and a doctorate degree from Juniata College. Since 1982, Dr. Ellis has been a member of the faculty at Georgetown University's School of Business Administration.

During his 7 years at the Irving Trust Co., Dr. Ellis had the opportunity to look at banking through the eyes of an outsider who was brought in to develop a financial control and planning program for the bank. Irving's management believed that a nonbanker might be able to look at the banking industry with a fresh and unbiased perspective. Dr. Ellis' lack of knowledge about the industry at the time enabled him to ask very simple, basic questions that a professed banker would have been embarrassed to ask. Some of the questions still being asked by Dr. Ellis today are: "Does it make sense for any financial institution to lend long and borrow short? If not, why do we subsidize this practice by guaranteeing what are essentially investment funds by labeling them as deposits?"

Mr. President, I ask that an article by Dr. Ellis expressing this point of view be printed in the RECORD immediately following my statement.

The article follows:

A SIMPLE SOLUTION TO A PROBLEM THAT SHOULDN'T EXIST

Today American taxpayers are faced with the possibility of having to pay more than one hundred billion dollars to rescue the savings of depositors in thousands of bankrupt savings and loan associations throughout the country. Although there are many causes for these failures, ranging from local economic problems to fraud and thievery, the underlying reason for their vulnerability to failure is that they, along with many other banking institutions, operate on the completely unsound financial principle of lending long and borrowing short.

Banks and savings and loan associations cannot invest depositor's funds in mortgages and other illiquid investments and promise depositors that these funds will be returned to them at any time they may wish to have them. The tragic effect of this totally illogical concept has been demonstrated many times over in the history of banking in the United States. Throughout the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries there were innumerable local bank failures. Most of these resulted from a loss of depositor confidence. Any rumor about a bank's soundness could trigger a rush by its depositors demanding the immediate return of their funds. No matter how sound a bank's investments were, they generally could not be liquidated instantly to provide the cash needed to pay off their depositors. As a result, many financially sound institutions were forced into bankruptcy and their depositors needlessly lost most of their savings.

In addition to the frequent local bank failures occuring during these years, there were periodic nationwide economic depressions during which depositors panicked, demanding the return of their deposits and forcing the closing of hundreds of banks across the country. The public's tolerance of these failures and the misery associated with them is difficult to understand. Even more difficult to understand is why there was apparently no recognition of the real cause of the failures. The public, press and politicians seemed to be satisfied by blaming them on the bankers, whom they generally labeled as greedy, dishonest or incompetent. In fact, throughout this period bankers were most frequently looked upon as villains who foreclosed on mortgages and stole the savings of widows and orphans.

The fallacy of the lend-long borrow-short principle reached crisis proportions during the 1929 to 1932 period. The stock market crash of 1929 ushered in a period of steady deterioration of public confidence in all of the country's financial institutions. Runs on banks became epidemic and a complete collapse of all of the nation's financial institutions appeared to be imminent. In 1932 as an emergency reaction to this crisis President Roosevelt declared a bank holiday in order to give the banks and the Federal Reserve time to cope with the situation.

What followed was the enactment of a great mass of legislation aimed at protecting investors and depositors from losses of any sort. In the case of the banks and savings and loans, deposit insurance corporations were established to guarantee the deposits of federally or state insured institutions. This restored the confidence of the public in the country's financial institutions. Depositor confidence, in turn, protected banks and savings institutions from the mass deposit withdrawals that had been the cause of most of their past failures.

Depositors now became a new class of investors who were protected from any loss of principal or interest on their savings regardless of the financial soundness of the institution in which they placed their funds. The burden of maintaining and assuring financial soundness was assigned to federal and state regulatory agencies. This system seemed to work well for many years, but in the late nineteen seventies the proliferation of small banks and savings and loans, plus the move toward deregulation made the inherent weaknesses of the system surface again.

Because all deposits of up to one hundred thousand dollars were insured, the smallest and financially weakest institutions could compete successfully against the largest and most financially sound by merely offering higher interest rates. Because all deposits were insured, the depositor was only concerned about where he could get the highest interest rates for his funds. In response to this demand, a nationwide network of deposit brokers sprang up to assist depositors find the highest rates available on any day on which they had funds to invest.

This free market scramble for funds based solely on interest rates, raised these rates to unprecedented high levels. This forced existing institutions to use these high cost funds to make increasingly risky loans. Also the ease of obtaining these funds encouraged entry into the market of a host of marginal institutions. It was truly a thieves' paradise where one could use government insured funds to make limitless investments in almost any venture. The consequences were predictable and catastrophic. An unprecedented wave of bank and savings and loan failures has swept the country, wiping out the reserves of many state deposit insurance agencies and threatening to do the same to federal deposit insurance funds.

The obvious question is why did the federal and state regulators allow these institutions to make such high risk, and frequently fraudulent investments. The answer can be found in the spirit of the times, the era of deregulation. There was a revolt by all sectors of the business community against what was perceived to be excessive government regulations. The banks and savings institutions in particular were loud complainers about the restrictions within which they were forced to operate. As a result, the power of the regulatory authorities, who in the past had kept a reasonable degree of order in the banking community, was all but wiped out. The resulting free-for-all competition among the country's banks and savings institutions has created a financial disaster far worse than any experienced to date. Not only will taxpayers have to bear the burden of this folly, but the attempt to hide its magnitude by tax benefit deals is making very rich individuals and corporations much richer while adding further to the taxpayers' burden.

We are now involved in a mad scramble to find ways to patch up the system without facing up to the huge costs involved. First, we must pay for the damage that has already been done during the great government subsidized investment spree. Next, we must face up to the continuing costs involved in maintaining a segment of our financial system that requires conversion of investment funds to demand funds in order to guarantee its investors protection against any loss of principal or interest. Nowhere else in our financial system do we provide investors such protection. Because funds invested in banks and savings institutions are called deposits rather than investments doesn't change their true nature.

However, to convince depositors in banks and savings institutions that they really are not depositors but investors who should be willing to accept the risks assumed by any other type of investor, may be a logical approach to the current problem, but certainly one that the public will not understand or accept. Most people assume that a financial institution that gives them both government guaranteed safety and instant availability of their funds is a cornerstone of America's economy. Therefore, to persuade the public that such an institution is not financially viable, would be impossible.

Despite this fact, we cannot allow the present system to continue operating as presently structured without endangering our entire economy. Congress and the state legislatures must recognize that a return to some form of strict government control over banking and savings institutions is essential. Such control, however, does not have to be applied across the board to all activities of these institutions as has been the case in the past. Because the only reason for government regulation of banks and savings institutions has been the need to insure depositors funds, regulation, therefore, should be restricted solely to government insured deposits. These deposits should be invested only in government securities and segregated from all other funds. Funds provided by any other financial activities should be exempt from regulation.

This proposal should result in several significant advantages over the present practice of allowing government insured deposits to be invested in illiquid high risk assets.

The restriction of government insured deposits to investment in government securities would significantly increase the market for these securities. This, in turn, should lower their interest rates and reduce the government's borrowing costs.

The workload of the regulatory agencies should be reduced substantially because they no longer will be required to audit and evaluate all of the assets and liabilities of an institution. This will also eliminate the present duplication of effort by the bank examiners and the public auditors. Determination of an institutions financial viability will be assumed fully by the public auditors thus eliminating the problems associated with the present shared responsibility.

Restricting regulation to only government insured deposits frees Congress from all of the complications associated with determining what activities banks and savings institutions should be allowed to participate in. This should result in much freer financial markets and fairer and more realistic competition among participants.

Opposition to this proposal will be great from both banks and savings institutions. The savings institutions, in particular, will portray themselves as the provider of mortgage funds that enable the common man to own a home. These funds, of course, will come from many little depositors who are saving for the education of their children, retirement or a rainy day. Although this may have been true thirty years ago, it is far from true today. Mortgages that originate in savings institutions are most frequently passed through to large mortgage pools and mortgage processing specialists. The savings institution is thus nothing more than a middle man. The money made available by unloading mortgages can then be invested in any other type of venture. It also should be noted that the eligibility requirements for mortgages have become much stricter because mortgages now must meet the standards demanded for negotiable instruments.

Similarly, the ideal of having funds supplied principally by small depositors in the community has also become a myth. As described previously, funds are obtained in large blocks through a nationwide network of deposit brokers whose only interest is obtaining the highest interest rates available. The little saver probably puts his savings in a money market fund.

In light of these facts, there should be no social, political or economic reason to allow a favored group of financial intermediaries to use government guaranteed funds to invest in anything other than government securities. This will provide a level playing field where all financial intermediaries will compete on an equal basis and the risks associated with any investment will be borne by the investor not the government.●

SCOTTSBURG HIGH SCHOOL WARRIORETTES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I ask you and my colleagues to join me in saluting the Scottsburg High School Warriorettes—the Indiana State girls basketball champions.

This game was truly a Cinderella story similar to the Milan High School boys' championship, on which the movie Hoosiers was based. In front of a crowd of 16,567 at Market Square Arena in Indianapolis, Coach Donna Cheatham led her perennially strong team to a thrilling overtime 74 to 72 defeat of Benton Central.

In October, Coach Cheatham and her team paid me a great honor in Scottsburg by making me the first honorary Warriorette and presenting me with a team jersey I have worn proudly in the Nation's Capital. In return I presented Renee Westmoreland, who scored 30 points to be named "Most Valuable Player," with a basketball net labeled "Market Square, 1989"—a symbol of what became one of the best predictions I have ever made.

My congratulations also go out to everyone associated with Scottsburg High School, as well as Mayor Bill Graham and all the people of Scottsburg—one of the most charming towns in beautiful southern Indiana.●

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I inquire of the distinguished Republican leader whether he has any further business or any further comments to make.

Mr. DOLE. I have no further business and no comments.

Mr. MITCHELL. Senator GRAHAM has requested an opportunity briefly to introduce legislation. Will the Senator indicate how much time he requires for that purpose?

Mr. GRAHAM. Two minutes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would the distinguished Senator from Florida be willing to wait just a couple of moments so we can complete other business and then we will yield to him?

CONSIDERATION OF CERTAIN MEASURES

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Judiciary Committee be discharged from further consideration of the following: House Joint Resolution 22, Federal Employees Recognition Week; Senate Joint Resolution 24, Older Americans Abuse Prevention Week; Senate Joint Resolution 54, Child Abuse Prevention Month; Senate Joint Resolution 64, Greek Independence Day—March 25, 1989; and that the Senate proceed to their immediate consideration en bloc, that they be read a third time and passed and that the motion to reconsider the votes by which they were agreed to be laid on the table en bloc, and that their preambles, where appropriate, be agreed to en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NATIONAL OLDER AMERICANS ABUSE PREVENTION WEEK

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 24) to designate the period commencing on May 1, 1989, and ending on May 7, 1989, as "National Older Americans Abuse Prevention Week," which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 24

Whereas each year an estimated 550,000 to 2.5 million elders are the victims of physical and emotional abuse, neglect, and denial of fundamental civil rights.

Whereas these elders represent every racial, religious and socio-economic class;

Whereas the suffering of these elders poses a threat to our families and to our society as a whole;

Whereas in most instances this neglect and abuse stems from the lack of information on intervention and prevention;

Whereas the health and well-being of our elders is, and must be, one of our Nation's highest priorities;

Whereas May, 1988, has traditionally been designated as "Older American Month", and provides the ideal opportunity for the people of the United States to become educated and aware of the welfare of the elderly; and

Whereas it is appropriate to focus the attention of the Nation upon the problem of elderly abuse; Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the period commencing on May 1, 1989, and ending on May 7, 1989, is designated as "National Older Americans Abuse Prevention Week", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon all Government agencies and the people of the United States to observe such period with appropriate programs ceremonies, and activities.

NATIONAL CHILD ABUSE PREVENTION MONTH

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 54) to designate the months of April, 1989 and 1990, as "National Child Abuse Prevention Month," which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 54

Whereas the incidence and prevalence of child abuse and neglect have reached alarming proportions in the United States;

Whereas An estimated six million children become victims of child abuse in this Nation each year;

Whereas an estimated four to five thousand of these children die as a result of such abuse each year;

Whereas the Nation faces a continuing need to support innovative programs to prevent child abuse and assist parents and family members in which child abuse occurs;

Whereas Congress has expressed its commitment to seeking and applying solutions to this problem by enacting the Child Abuse Prevention and Treatment Act of 1974;

Whereas many dedicated individuals and private organizations, including Child Help U.S.A., Parents Anonymous, the National Committee for the Prevention of Child Abuse, the American Humane Association, and other members of the National Child Abuse Coalition, are working to counter the ravages of abuse and neglect and to help child abusers break this destructive pattern of behavior;

Whereas the average cost for a public welfare agency to serve a family through a child abuse program is twenty times greater than self-help programs administered by private organizations;

Whereas organizations such as Parents Anonymous, and other members of the National Child Abuse Coalition, are expediting efforts to prevent child abuse in the next generation through special programs for abused children; and

Whereas it is appropriate to focus the attention of the Nation upon the problem of child abuse: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the months of April, 1989 and 1990, are designated as "National Child Abuse Prevention Month", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling on all Government agencies and the people of the United States to observe such month with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

GREEK INDEPENDENCE DAY: A NATIONAL DAY OF CELEBRATION OF GREEK AND AMERICAN DEMOCRACY

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S.J. Res. 64) to designate March 25, 1989, as "Greek Independence Day: A National Day of Celebration of Greek and American Democracy," which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S.J. RES. 64

Whereas the ancient Greeks developed the concept of democracy, in which the supreme power to govern was vested in the people;

Whereas the Founding Fathers of the United States of America drew heavily upon the political and philosophical experience of ancient Greece in forming our representative democracy;

Whereas March 25, 1989, marks the one hundred and sixty-eighth anniversary of the beginning of the revolution which freed the Greek people from the Ottoman Empire;

Whereas these and other ideals have forged a close bond between our two nations and their peoples; and

Whereas it is proper and desirable to celebrate with the Greek people, and to reaffirm the democratic principles from which our two great nations sprang: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That March 25, 1989, is designated as "Greek Independence Day: A National Day of Celebration of Greek and American Democracy", and that the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the designated day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

"GREEK INDEPENDENCE DAY" MARCH 25, 1989

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise in support of Senate Joint Resolution 64, a joint resolution to designate March 25, 1989, as "Greek Independence Day: A National Day of Celebration of Greek and American Democracy." The joint resolution also asks the President to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe the designated day with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

This joint resolution is identical to one that Senator SPECTER and I introduced in the last Congress, Senate Joint Resolution 346. That joint resolution, which had 60 consponsors, was approved unanimously by the Senate. Unfortunately, the House of Representatives did not act on the companion resolution so it did not become law. That is why we reintroduced the joint resolution in the Senate this year. The companion has been reintroduced in the House of Representatives.

March 25, 1989, marks the 168th anniversary of the beginning of the revolution which freed the Greek people from the Ottoman empire. It is fitting that we celebrate this day together with Greece in order to reaffirm the common democratic heritage of Americans and Greeks.

The ancient Greeks forged the very notion of democracy, placing the ultimate power to govern in the people. As Aristotle said:

If liberty and equality, as is thought by some, are chiefly to be found in democracy, they will best be attained when all persons alike share in the government to the utmost.

Because the concept of democracy was born in the age of the ancient Greeks, all Americans, whether or not of Greek ancestry, are kinsmen of a kind to the ancient Greeks. America's Founding Fathers drew heavily upon the political and philosophical experience of ancient Greece in forming our Government. For that contribution alone, we owe a heavy debt to the Greeks.

The common heritage which we share has forged a close bond between Greece and the United States, and between our peoples. And it is reflected in the numerous contributions made by present day Greek Americans in New Jersey and across the country to our American culture.

This joint resolution is a tribute to these contributions, past and present, which have greatly enriched American life.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES RECOGNITION WEEK

The joint resolution (H.J. Res. 22), to designate the week beginning March 6, 1989, as "Federal Employees Recognition Week," was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I am very pleased that today the Senate will act on House Joint Resoulution 22 to designate the week beginning March 6, 1989, as "Federal Employees Recognition Week." This joint resolution was introduced to honor and thank the men and women in Federal service who perform a multitude of jobs so important to the growth and vitality of our Nation.

The joint resolution, sponsored by Congresswoman OAKAR, passed the House of Representatives yesterday by unanimous vote. I commend Senate Majority Leader GEORGE MITCHELL, Senator METZENBAUM, and the members of the Senate Judiciary Committee for bringing this matter before the full Senate so promptly.

The more than 3 million men and women who have chosen public service as a career are a vital part of America's work force. The work they perform touches our lives in so many ways—from services for the elderly, handicapped, and disabled to daily mail delivery; from fighting fires to contributing to important medical and scientific research; from managing our parks and recreation areas to collecting our taxes.

We have some of the best trained and best qualified people in our country's work force in Federal service. They have consistently maintained high standards of excellence and have invested many dedicated years to serving their Government and fellow citizens.

Federal employees are trusted friends who Americans have learned can be relied upon. They deserve to be commended and encouraged for providing the high quality service necessary to carry out the priorities and objectives of our Government. I am pleased today to have the support of my colleagues in passing this joint resolution.

COMMENDING THE PEOPLE AND GOVERNMENT OF PAKISTAN ON THEIR RETURN TO DEMOCRACY

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of Calendar Order No. 22, Senate Resolution 59, a resolution commending the Government and people of Pakistan on their return to democracy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 59) commending the Government and the people of Pakistan on their return to democracy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, the resolution we are taking up today, Senate Resolution 59, commends the Government and people of Pakistan on an historic achievement—the return of democracy to that strategically important country of 100 million.

On November 16, 1988, Pakistan held a remarkable election. Throughout the country, tens of millions of Pakistanis lined up to cast ballots in the first free and fair elections in that country since the 1970's. As remarkable, the elections were conducted almost completely without violence.

The elections followed 11 years of military dictatorship during which many Pakistanis suffered from loss of basic human rights and worse. Chief among the victims was the last democratically elected Prime Minister Zulfikar Ali Bhutto and his family. The military regime had Prime Minister Bhutto put to death, while his widow and daughter were imprisoned and then exiled.

It is, therefore, all the more remarkable that the victor of the recent Pakistan elections, and now the new Prime Minister of Pakistan, is Benazir Bhutto. At 35, she is one of the world's youngest leaders. But, she has been tested as few political leaders are ever tested. In the face of solitary confinement, mistreatment, and prolonged imprisonment, she has shown extraordinary courage and determination.

As Prime Minister, Banazir Bhutto has moved quickly to remove the last vestiges of military rule. She has freed all political prisoners and ended restrictions on the printed and electronic media. For the first time in Pakistan history the opposition now receives coverage on the state-run television.

Prime Minister Bhutto has also moved to address Pakistan's growing drug crisis. In the space of a decade, Pakistan has moved from having virtually no heroin addicts to an addict population of some 500,000. She has declared that containing narcotics will be the top priority of her administration. It will be a tough task and one in which she will need our help.

Prime Minister Bhutto has promised to keep Pakistan's commitment not to develop nuclear weapons, and has promised continuity in Pakistan's policy of supporting freedom in Afghanistan. With Indian Prime Minister Rajiv Gandhi, she has embarked on an historic effort to improve relations between these two subcontinental antagonists.

This resolution applauds the new Government actions to build democracy in Pakistan, as well as its statements in the foreign policy field. Now that Pakistan is a democracy, it is my hope and expectation that relations between our two countries will become closer and stronger.

During the years of Benazir Bhutto's imprisonment, I had many occasions to raise her mistreatment with visiting Pakistani officials. During her years of exile, she was an annual visitor to Washington and I well recall our conversations about her efforts to bring democracy to Pakistan. Now she is Prime Minister, I am truly delighted to be the original sponsor of this resolution to commend the people of Pakistan, and the new Prime Minister, on the return of democracy. I urge adoption of Senate Resolution 59.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S. RES. 59

Whereas on November 16, 1988, the most free and fair elections in the history of Pakistan were held;

Whereas the elections were held in an orderly fashion and without any election-related fatalities;

Whereas the support of President Ghulam Ishaq Khan, of the Judiciary and of the Military was essential to the restoration of democracy in Pakistan;

Whereas the elections produced an electoral victory for Benazir Bhutto and the Pakistan People's Party;

Whereas Benazir Bhutto has shown extraordinary political and personal courage in the face of prolonged imprisonment and family tragedy;

Whereas Prime Minister Bhutto has moved swiftly to restore full human rights to the people of Pakistan by ordering the release of all political prisoners and the end of restrictions on the written and electronic media; and

Whereas Prime Minister Bhutto has pledged to continue Pakistan's steadfast support of freedom for the Afghan people, has promised that Pakistan will not develop nuclear weapons, and has undertaken initiatives to improve relations with India: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States—

(1) commends the Government and people of Pakistan on the holding of free and fair elections and for the return to democracy;

(2) congratulates Benazir Bhutto on her election as Prime Minister of Pakistan and wishes her a successful administration;

(3) expresses its deep appreciation to President Ghulam Ishaq Kahn, Chief Justice Nasrullah, and Chief of Army Staff Beg for their critical role in insuring the successful transition to democracy in Pakistan;

(4) commends Prime Minister Bhutto for her prompt actions to free political prisoners and restore full human rights and express its support for her foreign policy statements on Afghanistan, nuclear weapons, and relations with India; and

(5) expresses its strong support for Pakistan's new democracy, reiterates its commitment to the security and independence of Pakistan, and affirms its willingness to assist the new government's efforts to address Pakistan's many economic and social problems.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

PEACE AND FAMINE RELIEF IN SUDAN

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of Calendar item No. 21, Senate Concurrent Resolution 15, a concurrent resolution concerning peace and famine relief in Sudan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 15), concerning peace and famine relief in Sudan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, one of the world's most urgent humanitarian crises today is in southern Sudan. We have today before the Senate a bipartisan concurrent resolution which speaks to the urgent needs in that country for peace and international relief assistance.

I am pleased to be joined in this effort by Senator SIMPSON, the ranking member of our Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Affairs as well as Senator PELL, Senator SIMON, Senator KASSEBAUM, and Senator HUMPHREY in the development of this concurrent resolution. I commend the Foreign Relations Committee for its prompt action in support of it.

The timeliness of the concurrent resolution is unquestionable as hundreds of thousands of Sudanese civilians have died over the past 2 years. And many more will be lost if peace is not achieved and the international community does not respond further to the needs that exist. There are urgent steps which the Khartoum government can and must take, which the concurrent resolution before us clearly outlines.

In December, the Subcommittee on Immigration and Refugee Affairs sent a special study mission to the Horn of Africa specifically to look into the questions of peace and relief in Sudan. What the mission witnessed was a tragedy of monumental proportions.

Certainly, famine is no stranger to the Sudan. But in this case, unlike the famine of 1984–85, the shortages are not due to natural disaster, but are man made. This time food shortages are primarily the result of the ongoing civil war in southern Sudan.

For this reason, Secretary of State Baker issued a vitally important statement last month which noted that "starvation will not end until the fighting ends" and called on both sides to the confict to "put peace first."

It is for this reason, Mr. President, that it is essential that the concurrent resolution before us today deals not only with the relief needs of the southern population, but with the requirements of peace as well.

While the needs are urgent, it is also important to recognize that some efforts are already underway. And our concurrent resolution today recognizes and commends them. These include the important breakthrough of the International Committee of the Red Cross in delivering relief supplies to civilians on both sides of the civil conflict. It includes the activities of the U.S. Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance in getting assistance in to key towns in southern Sudan—towns which had been without food for extended periods. And it also encompasses the efforts of voluntary agencies, which are now expanding their activities on behalf of the Sudanese populations.

It is also important to mention, Mr. President, the role which U.N. Secretary General Javier Perez de Cuellar is fulfilling to advance the twin causes of peace and relief within the country. In just about a week, the United Nations will be conducting a major conference in Khartoum to address the continuing emergency in that country.

While involvement in this grave humanitarian crisis is growing, there is clearly much more that needs to be done—and soon. This concurrent resolution will provide guidance to our Government and the international community as to the steps which now must be taken.

As Mr. Francis M. Deng, former Sudanese Ambassador to Washington, recently stated, "It is not the dead who suffer, it is those who watch them die." Today, with this concurrent resolution, we cannot be accused of being mere onlookers to this humanitarian disaster, and I urge my colleagues to adopt it.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, as one who joined Senator KENNEDY in submitting Senate Concurrent Resolution 15 on the situation in Sudan, I believe that we must move vigorously to respond to the overwhelming human tragedy the people of Sudan are facing.

Last year an estimated 200,000 to 500,000 people died in Sudan of starvation. An additional 3 million—including orphaned children—have wandered in search of food, many to border refugee camps in neighboring Ethiopia. And literally 1.5 million southerners starve on the outskirts of Sudan's capital, Khartoum. The Sudanese people have become pawns in a 30-year-old civil conflict between the dominant Arab Muslim north and the African Christina and animist south. Both sides have used food as a weapon against the other, preventing food from reaching territory held by the other side. Millions of innocent people are caught in the fatal crossfire.

Many of us are disappointed by the long silence and failure on the part of the last administration to address this problem vigorously by taking effective action on food relief and movement toward a cease-fire. Secretary of State James Baker's February 8, 1989, statement is a welcome relief. He has indicated that although:

Many Sudanese and expatriates are laboring tirelessly to ensure food deliveries, and the cooperation with these efforts by both the Sudanese Government and the Sudanese People's Liberation Army (SPLA) has improved in recent months * * * much more needs to be done.

Removing the obstacles to food delivery is critical and Secretary Baker has said that:

The United States will do all it can to support these efforts.

We are here today to determine how the United States can move vigorously on food relief. In 5 weeks, the rain will begin in Sudan. We need to move quickly before food transportation becomes more difficult. What actions will we take? How can we encourage the Sudanese Government and the SPLA to remove obstacles to food delivery?

The Kennedy concurrent resolution, among other things, urges:

The President and the Secretary of State to exercise vigorous international leadership in pressing for a genuine national reconciliation and an end to widescale starvation and suffering in Sudan, through forceful direct representations to the Government of Sudan and the SPLA, through sustained multilateral, diplomatic initiatives and active United States-Soviet collaborations, and through the designation of a special United States government envoy.

We also urge a review of United States-Sudan relations, including an examination of our bilateral and multilateral aid to Sudan, if the Sudanese Government fails within 6 months to make progress on food relief and on negotiations with the SPLA toward a cease-fire.

Former Sudanese Ambassador to the United States Francis M. Deng said in a recent article:

While we and our friends must all work for peace with a sense of urgency, the international community should spare no time or effort in bringing immediate relief to the starving masses. To be silent or equivocal about a human tragedy of such magnitude would not only add an international dimension to the national vacuum of moral leadership but would indeed be a shortsighted diplomatic miscalculation. To quote words I used some 16 years ago under similar but less tragic circumstances, "It is not the dead who suffer, it is those who cause their death and those who watch them die."

Last Thursday, I chaired hearings of the Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee on African Affairs on the situation in Sudan and explored these questions with administration and private witnesses. My hope is that we will be able to move quickly in the next weeks and provide leadership in moving others to do the same.

Last Friday evening, 10 Senators and Representatives joined me in sending a telegram to the Sudanese Prime Minister and the leader of the Sudanese People's Liberation Movement urging a temporary cease-fire to facilitate the delivery of food and other humanitarian relief before the rainy season begins. I ask unanimous consent that the text of the telegram be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 24, 1989.

His Excellency SADIQ AL-MAHDI,
Prime Minister
Republic of Sudan

DEAR MR. PRIME MINISTER: As friends of the Sudan, we are deeply concerned about the tragic situation in southern Sudan which has caused massive human suffering. The war has caused hundreds of thousands of innocent civilians to die of starvation and two million more to flee their homes in search of food and security. If all of us could work together in the next few weeks before the rainy season begins, we could help save countless lives through coordinated food relief efforts. In that regard, we call upon both parties to the war to adopt an immediate temporary cease-fire to facilitate the delivery of food and other humanitarian relief until the rainy season begins. The cease-fire would be a demonstration of good will on the part of both parties and might become an important first step toward peace in Sudan.

We are sending this telegram to you and Colonel John Garang.

Cordially,

Nancy Landon Kassebaum, Ranking Member, Subcommitee on African Affairs; Committee on Foreign Relations.
Paul Simon, Chairman, Subcommittee on African Affairs, Committee on Foreign Relations.
Senators Gordon J. Humphrey, Richard G. Lugar, Alan K. Simpson, Claiborne Pell, Jesse Helms, Edward M. Kennedy.
Representatives Howard Wolpe, Dan Burton, Frank R.Wolf.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, Sudan is in the midst of an increasingly bloody civil war which has claimed the lives of hundreds of thousands of Sudanese people and forced another 2 million to flee their homes in search of food and security. The war is rooted in religious and ethnic differences between the south, which is inhabited primarily by animists and Christian Africans, and the north, where Arabic-speaking Muslims dominate. Efforts by the Muslim-based government in Khartoum to Islamize Sudan and deny the south equal political representation and economic opportunities have spawned s strongly supported southern insurgent movement, the Sudanese People's Liberation Movement [SPLM] with a well-trained and equipped army [SPLA].

Perhaps the greatest tragedy of the war is that both parties have used food as a political weapon and deliberately obstructed international relief efforts. Government forces have denied food to civilians in government held towns merely because they are Dinkas—the largest tribe in the south and the base of support for the SPLM. The SPLA, in turn, has attacked food convoys and relief planes designated for government held areas. In the last 2 years alone, an estimated 100,000 to 250,000 southerners died from starvation. As many as 1½ million people may be at risk in the rural areas of southern Sudan unless international relief efforts are expanded.

The recent agreement between the Sudanese Government and the SPLA to allow the International Committee of the Red Cross [ICRC] to bring food into six towns, three government held and three SPLA controlled, is a step in the right direction. But it is not enough. Food must be delivered to many more towns in both areas. This can happen only if the Government of Sudan and the SPLA are willing to put the welfare of civilians ahead of military goals.

The famine in Sudan is not the result of drought or lack of food but of the war. It is imperative that the parties to the war adopt an immediate cease-fire to facilitate international relief efforts, especially before the rainy season begins. A cease-fire could be an important first step toward resolving the issues that divide the people of Sudan and prevent Sudan from becoming a stable and united nation.

As the central government, the Government of Sudan has a special responsibility to facilitate international humanitarian relief efforts, to protect the welfare of all the Sudanese people, and to seize every opportunity to bring the war to a speedy conclusion. The concurrent resolution before us reflects the growing concern in Congress and among the American people about the situation in southern Sudan. I believe this is a good concurrent resolution and I urge its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution, and the preamble, are as follows:

S. CON. RES. 15

Whereas starvation and civil war have killed nearly 1,000,000 southern Sudanese civilians since 1983 and displaced 2,000,000 to 3,000,000 of southern Sudan's 6,000,000 people;

Whereas numerous and reliable reports from the field document that both sides of the conflict, the Government of Sudan and the Sudanese People's Liberation Army (hereafter in this concurrent resolution referred to as the "SPLA"), have not only neglected the welfare of southern Sudanese people, but in many instances have deliberately deprived southern Sudanese of food and medicine and have used food as a weapon of war;

Whereas combatants have massacred untold numbers of civilians, destroyed entire villages, and decimated the infrastructure in southern Sudan;

Whereas a national peace accord, which is essential both to an effective emergency relief effort and to a negotiated peace settlement, was endorsed by the SPLA and the Democratic Unionist Party in November 1988, but did not receive the agreement of the Government of Sudan;

Whereas the United States and other international donors have taken several significant steps to alleviate famine, including an October 1988 emergency airlift by the United States Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance and a relief operation carried out by the International Committee of the Red Cross in both rebel and government-held areas in southern Sudan;

Whereas such humanitarian efforts are crucial first steps but assist only a small fraction of the more than 2,000,000 Sudanese in dire need of relief;

Whereas the United States has a special relationship with the people and Government of Sudan, including the provision of more than $100,000,000 in bilateral and multilateral assistance in fiscal year 1988, the largest amount received by any nation in sub-Saharan Africa;

Whereas Secretary of State James A. Baker III, in a statement on February 8, 1989, emphasized that "starvation will almost certainly not end until the fighting ends," urged both the Government of Sudan and the SPLA to "put peace first and to agree to an early ceasefire" in order to facilitate relief, and called on "authorities at all levels on both sides to remove remaining obstacles and do everything possible to provide emergency relief to victims caught in garrison towns and other areas of the war zone"; and

Whereas the Secretary General of the United Nations, at the invitation of the Government of Sudan, has announced a relief conference to be held in Khartoum in March 1989: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress—

(1) commends Secretary of State Baker's statement of February 8, 1989, as a major step forward in dramatically focusing world attention upon the humanitarian disaster in Sudan and the urgent need for responsible action by the Government of Sudan and the SPLA to bring about a ceasefire, effective emergency relief, and implementation of a meaningful peace accord;

(2) commends the relief activities in Sudan of the Agency for International Development, the Office of Foreign Disaster Assistance, international organizations, and American, international, and indigenous private and voluntary agencies;

(3) condemns and deplores the use of food as a weapon by the Government of Sudan and the SPLA and calls upon each of them to respect and honor the safe passage of food and emergency relief supplies to civilians in affected areas;

(4) supports all efforts by the international community, private and voluntary agencies, and concerned governments to provide assistance to imperiled Sudanese, including cross-border feeding operations and prepositioning of food in southern Sudan;

(5) commends the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) for its success in working simultaneously with the Government of Sudan and the SPLA to deliver food and emergency assistance to civilians on both sides of the conflict, and supports efforts by the ICRC to rapidly expand the volume of relief delivered and the number of sites reached;

(6) supports the expanding involvement of the Secretary General of the United Nations in promoting peace and relief activities in Sudan and commends the Government of Sudan for welcoming these efforts;

(7) urges the President and the Secretary of State to exercise vigorous international leadership in pressing for a genuine national reconciliation and an end to widescale starvation and suffering in Sudan, through forceful direct representations to the Government of Sudan and the SPLA, through sustained multilateral, diplomatic initiatives, and active United States-Soviet collaborations, and through the designation of a special United States Government envoy;

(8) urges the President and the Secretary of State to conduct a comprehensive reassessment of the United States' relationship with the Government of Sudan, including critical examination of future bilateral and multilateral assistance given by the United States to Sudan (other than humanitarian assistance), unless within 6 months after the date of adoption of this concurrent resolution—

(A) the Government of Sudan has made demonstrable progress in facilitating increased relief to displaced populations in areas it controls, through for instance, increased mobilization of key government resources and improved controls over government-armed militias; and

(B) the Government of Sudan has made significant progress in negotiations with the SPLA for a national peace accord and a cease-fire; and

(9) urges the President and the Secretary of State to impress upon the SPLA its special responsibility to permit the flow of international relief to civilians in government-controlled southern cities and towns, the imperative for the SPLA-controlled areas and, finally, the importance for the SPLA to negotiate independently with the Government of Sudan for a national peace accord.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this concurrent resolution to the President and the Secretary of State.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Florida be recognized for 2 minutes, and that upon the conclusion of his remarks the Senate stand in recess under the previous order until 10 o'clock in the morning on tomorrow, Friday, March 3.

(The remarks of Mr. GRAHAM pertaining to the introduction of legislation are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I amend my request by asking that, following the remarks of the Senator from Florida, the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PRESSLER], be recognized for 3 minutes, and that upon the conclusion of his remarks the Senate then stand in recess under the previous order until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning, Friday, March 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Reischauer as Director of the Congressional Budget Office for the term of office beginning on January 3, 1987, to take effect on March 6, 1989.

PRINTING OF RESPONSE TO MOTIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair submits to the Senate for printing in the Senate Journal and in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the response by the managers of the House of Representatives to motions to dismiss several of the articles of impeachment against Judge Alcee L. Hastings, filed by his counsel, pursuant to section 2 of Senate Resolution 39, 101st Congress, 1st session, which response was received by the Secretary of the Senate on March 2, 1989.

The response follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Re Impeachment Inquiry of Judge Alcee L. Hastings.

Hon. WALTER J. STEWART,
Secretary of the Senate of the United States, The Capitol.

DEAR SECRETARY STEWART: Enclosed for filing in the above-captioned matter are the following:

1. The Response of the House of Representatives to Respondent's Motion to Dismiss Articles I Through XV;

2. The Response of the House of Representatives to Respondent's Motion to Dismiss Article XVII; and

3. The Executive Summary of the Response.

Thank you.

ALAN I. BARON,
Special Counsel to the Managers of the House of Representatives.

[In the Senate of the United States sitting as a Court of Impeachment]

In re Impeachment of Judge Alcee L. Hastings

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY RESPONSE OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES TO RESPONDENT'S MOTIONS TO DISMISS

I. INTRODUCTION

In Articles I through XV, the House charges Respondent with having participated in a corrupt conspiracy to obtain a bribe in a criminal case pending before him, and with committing multiple acts of knowingly making false statements under oath in order to mislead the trier of fact during the 1983 criminal trial in which respondent was tried on the conspiracy charge. In his Motion to Dismiss those articles, Respondent asserts that principles of double jeopardy bar Senate action because impeachment is a criminal proceeding. According to Respondent, because he was acquitted by the jury, the Senate cannot now proceed with his impeachment trial. In addition, Respondent contends that the Senate should not proceed with a trial because of the delay between the alleged misconduct and his impeachment by the House of Representatives. With respect to Article XVII, Respondent also contends that by combining the subjects of the preceding articles in an omnibus article, the article fails to allege a separate high crime or misdemeanor, and impermissibly permits "cumulative" guilty votes.[1]

[1] Respondent has not moved to dismiss Article XVI, which pertains to the wiretap disclosure allegation.

II. DOUBLE JEOPARDY PRINCIPLES DO NOT APPLY

A. The Constitutional Doctrine of Separation of Powers Mandates an Impeachment Process that is Separate and Independent of the Judicial Branch

Respondent's double jeopardy argument is incompatible with the very structure of our Government. Neither the Senate nor the House of Representatives can defer to the Judicial Branch in a matter which is their unique constitutional responsibility. The doctrine of separation of powers and the system of checks and balances established by our Constitution require the Congress to exercise its independent judgment in an impeachment proceeding, irrespective of the outcome of a prior criminal or civil case.

Moreover, the doctrine of separation of powers also prohibits the Senate from delegating to the Judicial Branch its impeachment authority. The Supreme Court has emphasized that neither the Judicial Branch, nor any other branch of the Federal Government may be "assigned nor allowed 'tasks that are more appropriately accomplished by [other] branches.'"

The Senate has recognized these fundamental constitutional principles and refused to defer to a decision of the Judicial Branch in lieu of exercising its unique constitutional responsibility. In the impeachment trial of Judge Harry Claiborne, for example, the Senate Impeachment Trial Committee refused to rely on the criminal conviction of Judge Claiborne. The same reasoning was applied by the Senate Select Committee on Ethics with respect to expulsion proceeding concerning Senator Harrison A. Williams, Jr.

B. Impeachment Is Not A Criminal Proceeding Warranting Application Of The Double Jeopardy Clause

The central and explicit premise underlying Respondent's double jeopardy argument is that a Senate impeachment trial is a criminal proceeding. Then, and only then, would principles of double jeopardy apply. Respondent's premise is without merit.

1. Relevant Legal Analysis

The Fifth Amendment provides in pertinent part, ". . . nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; . . ." The double jeopardy clause has been held to apply to all criminal matters irrespective of the outcome of a criminal trial.

It is also settled law that the double jeopardy clause does not apply to non-criminal proceedings, even if those proceedings are based upon the same facts which resulted in a criminal acquittal. In determining whether the double jeopardy clause applies to a particular proceeding, therefore, the Supreme Court distinguishes between remedial and punitive proceedings.

Numerous proceedings have been deemed remedial in nature, even though the impact of the judgment is highly negative to the financial and personal interests of the individual involved. Thus, the courts have permitted forfeiture, disbarment, deportation and parole revocation proceedings based upon the same facts resulting in a criminal acquittal.

The threshold question, therefore, is whether an impeachment proceeding is essentially remedial in nature and thereby unaffected by the double jeopardy clause, or is a criminal, punitive proceeding to which the double jeopardy clause applies. A review of the text of the Constitution, the historical evidence, analysis by and experts in the field of constitutional law, and pronouncements of both the House and the Senate regarding the nature of an impeachment proceeding, leads to the conclusion that the sanctions are remedial rather than punitive and the Framers did not intend impeachment to be criminal in nature.

a. The Framers intended impeachment to be a non-criminal proceeding

Article I, Section 3, Clause 7 of the Constitution provides:

"Judgment in cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of Honor, Trust or Profit under the United States: but the Party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment according to law."

In the impeachment judgment clause, therefore, the Framers contemplate a dual process where impeachment would be available to remove an offending official from public office, but the Executive Branch would retain its jurisdiction to proceed with a criminal prosecution, if appropriate.

Other Constitutional provisions that address the nature of impeachment also indicate that it was not the intent of the Framers that impeachment be considered a criminal proceeding. For example, even though impeachment is grouped with "Crimes" and "offenses" in two provisions of our Constitution, it is mentioned solely for the purpose of excluding impeachment from the protections created from criminal matters in those provisions: There is no right to a jury trial in an impeachment, while a right to trial by jury is a fundamental precept of our criminal jurisprudence; the President cannot pardon the official convicted in an impeachment proceeding, a power the President has in criminal cases. Thus, the Constitution treats impeachment separately from criminal proceedings.

Although some language of the Constitution suggests connections between impeachment and the criminal process, e.g. the Senate "convicts" on charges of "Treason, bribery or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors," these references stem from the fact that the English system of impeachment, to a limited extent, served as a model for the Framers. English impeachments were unquestionably criminal proceedings. However, in this and other critical respects the English model was rejected, rendering the American impeachment a remedial process.

The separation of functions between impeachment and criminal proceedings has been commented upon many times by some of the most distinguished constitutional scholars in our nation's history. Repeatedly, they reach the same fundamental conclusion: the purpose of impeachment is not to punish an individual, but to protect the institutions of government from persons who have abused their postiions of public trust. That protection is effected by removing such federal officials from office and, in some instances, barring them from holding future office. This analysis also supports the conclusion that, as established by the Framers, impeachment is non-criminal proceeding.

b. The history of the double jeopardy clause does not support Respondent's argument

A review of the proceedings surrounding the adoption of the Constitutional amendment embodying the double jeopardy clause supports the conclusion that the Framers intended impeachment to be a remedial proceeding not subject to the principles of double jeopardy. The deletion of the specific exemption for impeachment from James Madison's proposed double jeopardy clause reflects no more than a removal of language deemed unnecessary in view of the existing provisions of the Constitution which had already taken impeachment outside the scope of double jeopardy. Similar treatment was afforded Madison's proposal with respect to trial by jury which included a specific exemption for impeachment.

c. The constitutional sanctions for impeachable conduct are not punitive

Even if the intent of the Framers were found to be ambiguous, application of the established judicial test to determine whether double jeopardy principles are applicable would lead to the same conclusion that they are not.

When determining whether a statutory or regulatory proceeding is remedial in nature, and therefore not subject to the protections of the double jeopardy clause, the courts look beyond the intent of the drafters to determine whether the sanctions imposed in the particular proceeding are such that the proceeding itself must be considered punitive rather than remedial. Here, the question is whether the sanctions imposed by the Senate upon conviction of an impeachable offense are such that impeachment must be considered punitive. The answer is no.

In the Constitution, the Framers established limited sanctions for a Federal official found guilty of an impeachable offense: "removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust or Profit under the United States." On their face, these sanctions are remedial. Removal from office and future disqualification are remedies unique to impeachment proceedings; they cannot be imposed by any court as a punishment for criminal conduct. They affect only a limited number of individuals (the President, Vice President and civil officers of the United States) and relate only to their continued or future tenure in Federal office. In addition, the remedies afforded the Senate focus on the needs of the public and the nation rather than on punishment of the accused individual.

2. Both the House and the Senate have recognized the noncriminal nature of impeachment

Respondent's fundamental premise that impeachment is a criminal proceeding has been rejected by both the House and the Senate. Over a hundred years ago, in 1873, the House Committee on the Judiciary explored the nature of impeachment in connection with the impeachment inquiry of Vice President Colfax. Their report concluded, "impeachment was intended by the framers of the Constitution to be wholly remedial and not punitive. . . ."

In the Claiborne impeachment trial, the Senate recognized the distinction between impeachment and criminal proceedings when it determined that the criminal standard of proof—beyond a reasonable doubt—does not necessarily apply in an impeachment trial.

Finally, in the recent Report of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration on what procedures to employ in this impeachment case, the issue of the nature of impeachment was considered. The Committee stated, "Most important, it must be remembered that an impeachment should not be viewed as a criminal prosecution."

Thus, not only the relevant legal analysis and historical precedent establish that impeachment is a remedial proceeding, but also the House and Senate have reached the same conclusion in this and other proceedings. Respondent's double jeopardy argument should be rejected because it rests on the faulty premise that impeachment is criminal in nature.

III. THERE HAS BEEN NO UNWARRANTED DELAY BETWEEN THE ALLEGED OFFENSES AND RESPONDENT'S IMPEACHMENT

The offense charged in Article I, the alleged bribery conspiracy between Judge Hastings and William Borders, occurred in 1981. The offenses charged in Articles II through XV, the alleged perjury committed by Judge Hastings at his criminal trial, occurred in February 1983. Seven and five years later respectively, on August 3, 1988, the House of Representatives impeached Judge Hastings for these and other offenses.

There is no statute of limitations applicable to articles of impeachment, for neither the Constitution nor House or Senate rules require that articles be adopted by the House or presented to the Senate within any particular length of time. Therefore, as a matter of law, Articles I through XV cannot be dismissed due to the time that has passed since the commission of the offenses. Rather, Judge Hastings must be raising the equivalent of an equitable defense of laches, which requires a showing of inexcusable and unreasonable delay prejudicial to the defendant.

In fact, the doctrine of laches, too, does not apply to the Federal government. However, even assuming, arguendo, that a laches defense were to apply to the House of Representatives, Respondent's delay argument has no merit. First, the time period between the commission of the alleged offenses and Judge Hasting's impeachment falls well within historic precedent. For example, in the impeachment of Judge Charles Swayne, two of the six articles alleged offenses that occurred more than twelve years prior to the impeachment. Most recently, in the impeachment of Judge Harry Claiborne, six years elapsed between the misconduct and impeachment. In both cases, the Senate convicted on these articles.

Second, the adoption of Articles I through XV was timely, proceeding in accordance with the procedures established by Congress in the Judicial Councils Reform and Judicial Conduct and Disability Act of 1980. Finally, much of the time elapsed stems from litigation initiated by Respondent or engendered by his opposition to the disclosure of grand jury and other document.

The fact that evidence has been available since Judge Hastings' arrest and criminal trial does not require the House of Representatives to impeach him immediately. There is no such constitutional requirement and, as illustrated by the investigation conducted in this case by the Eleventh Circuit pursuant to the 1980 Act, a thorough and unbiased study of the allegations is advisable, even though time consuming. This is especially true in a case such as this, in which the respondent challenges in court many aspects of the judicial and congressional investigations.

The 1980 Act establishes a mechanism through which any citizen can initiate a complaint and a respondent's own peers review the allegations. Using such a procedure weeds out frivolous complaints and creates an initial record from which the House may launch its own investigation. The House, of course, may proceed with an impeachment without a Judicial investigation. Respondent, however, is arguing that the House is required to bypass the very mechanism created by Congress to investigate claims against Federal judges. This is an untenable position.

Respondent's claim that he has been prejudiced by delay is also without merit. Nearly all of the witnesses who will testify with respect to Articles I through XV have testified under oath in other proceedings. The House will stipulate to the authenticity of this testimony. Three of the unavailable witnesses named by Respondent, were never even called by Respondent at his criminal trial, nor does he explain in any detail why their testimony is now so "crucial" to his defense. The other two unavailable witnesses listed by Respondent have had their sworn testimony recorded in previous trials.

IV. THE OMNIBUS ARTICLE PLEADS A SEPARATE OFFENSE

Article XVII follows a practice begun in the last century of not merely pleading one or more impeachable offenses, but asserting that a course of behavior involving several forms of misconduct has damaged the body politic. Such omnibus articles have formed the basis for all the impeachment convictions in the twentieth century.

In the American experience, a total of only five persons, all of them judges, have been impeached and convicted by the Congress. Three of those men (Judges Archbald (1912-1913), Ritter (1933-1936) and Claiborne (1986)) were tried and convicted on so-called "omnibus" articles of impeachment.

Thus, in every impeachment trial in the twentieth century which resulted in conviction, the Senate has convicted on an article that included several acts of misconduct, including acts that were separately alleged in other articles. A conviction on the "omnibus" article is a recognition by the Senate that such a formulation of charges is proper, and that the pattern of behavior alleged therein is a separate basis for removing the official from office.

The case of Judge Halsted Ritter is most instructive here, since the omnibus article was challenged by the respondent on the same grounds as raised here. Judge Ritter asserted that when the Senate voted on the omnibus article, it would have already voted on the previous articles, and

"The object and purpose of such an arrangement can be but to cumulate adverse votes, if any, upon prior articles, with the hope that the cumulative or collective arrangement may be sufficient to sustain those articles in the vote upon the final article * * *"

The Managers responded that the article raised,

"* * * a substantial doubt as to [Judge Ritter's] judicial integrity. . . . We contend that this is the highest crime which a judge can commit on the bench. It is not whether he did this thing, that thing, or the other thing, but whether or not the sum total of the things he has done has made the people doubt his integrity as a judicial officer."

The Senate acquitted Judge Ritter on each of the preceding articles, but found him guilty only of the omnibus article. A point of order was raised that the conviction was improper because of the acquittal on the substantive charges of the preceding articles. The point of order was overruled by the Chair, the Chair stating, "A point of order is made as to Article VII in which Respondent is charged with general misbehavior. It is a separate charge from any other charge."

In the same sense, Article XVII herein is a charge separate and distinct from the preceding articles. Indeed, in the present proceeding, an even stronger case can be made that the omnibus article is a separate charge. Although it generally pertains to conduct that is also alleged in the preceding articles, Article XVII does not merely refer to those articles, but sets forth specific conduct which has undermined confidence in the Federal judiciary. Moreover, the recitation of conduct in Article XVII differs in several respects from that described in the previous articles.

As in previous impeachments resulting in conviction, the final article in this case alleges general misconduct resulting in the undermining of the Federal judiciary. Although in the instant case, each act of misconduct individually constitutes reprehensible behavior totally at odds with continued service as a Federal judge, the gravamen of Article XVII is that the sum total of the individual acts is destructive to the judiciary. History attests to the fact that a pattern of misconduct is a separate basis for conviction and removal from office.

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, Respondent's Motion to Dismiss Articles I through XV, and his Motion to Dismiss Article XVII should be rejected.

Respectfully submitted, The U.S. House of Representatives.

In re Impeachment of Judge Alcee L. Hastings

RESPONSE OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES TO RESPONDENT'S MOTION TO DISMISS ARTICLES I THROUGH XV

I. INTRODUCTION

In this impeachment proceeding, the House of Representatives has presented to the Senate seventeen Articles of Impeachment against United States District Judge Alcee L. Hastings. After an exhaustive review of the evidence, the House concluded by an overwhelming vote of 413 to 3, with 4 voting present, that Judge Hastings (hereinafter referred to as "Respondent") has engaged in misconduct that warrants removal from office.

Respondent has filed before the Senate two motions in which he argues that sixteen of the Articles of Impeachment should be dismissed prior to trial. The House Managers address Respondent's Motion to Dismiss Articles I through XV in this memorandum. The Managers address his Motion to Dismiss Article XVII in a separate memorandum filed contemporaneously.

In Articles I through XV, the House charges Respondent with having participated in a corrupt conspiracy to obtain a bribe in a criminal case pending before him, and with knowingly making false statements under oath in order to mislead the trier of fact during his 1983 criminal trial on the conspiracy charge. In his Motion to Dismiss Articles I through XV, Respondent asserts that principles of double jeopardy bar Senate action because impeachment is a criminal proceeding. According to Respondent, because he was acquitted by the jury, the Senate cannot now proceed with his impeachment trial. In addition, Respondent contends that the Senate should not proceed with a trial because of the delay between the alleged misconduct and his impeachment by the House of Representatives.

The Senate should reject both of these arguments. The trial on Articles I through XV should proceed because the prohibition against double jeopardy does not apply to an impeachment proceeding. Respondent's double jeopardy argument, in fact, is inconsistent with the constitutional structure of our Government, misapplies the historic precedent and ignores the relevant legal analysis. Similarly, the Senate should reject Respondent's delay argument, because the time that has elapsed between the commission of the alleged misconduct and Respondent's impeachment is a product of two factors: the litigation occasioned by Judge Hastings' objections to the proceedings leading up to his impeachment, and the diligence and care with which the various institutions involved in this matter have handled the inquiry. In any event, the time lapse between the events in question and this impeachment falls well within the historic precedent of other impeachment proceedings.

As established by the Framers of our Constitution, the Senate has the responsibility of resolving impeachment proceedings, including the issue of whether the trial in this case should proceed on all seventeen articles. When deciding Respondent's Motions to Dismiss, the Senate, like courts of law, must assume as true the allegations contained in the Articles of Impeachment. In other words, to grant Respondent's motions, the Senate must determine that the trial on Articles I through XV and Article XVII should not proceed even assuming Respondent has conspired to accept a bribe, lied repeatedly under oath and conducted himself in a manner that undermines the integrity of the Federal bench, as alleged by the House of Representatives.

Finally, in support of his Motion to Dismiss Articles I through XV, Respondent included an extensive Statement of Facts responding to the Statement of Facts in the Report of the Committee on the Judiciary which accompanied the House impeachment resolution.[1] For the convenience of the Senate, the Managers include in the attached Appendix the Statement of Facts from the Committee Report addressing the bribery and perjury allegations.[2]

II. RESPONDENT'S IMPEACHMENT TRIAL SHOULD PROCEED BECAUSE DOUBLE JEOPARDY PRINCIPLES DO NOT APPLY

In his Motion to Dismiss Articles I through XV, Respondent asserts that his impeachment trial is barred by the doctrine of double jeopardy. He alleges that an acquittal by a jury in an earlier criminal case precludes the Senate from proceeding with this impeachment. The consequence of Respondent's position is that even if one concludes that Respondent conspired to take a bribe, knowingly testified falsely under oath, and undermined the integrity of the Federal judiciary, the Senate cannot exercise its unique constitutional responsibility of protecting the institutions of government from those who abuse public office.

Respondent's argument is without merit and should be rejected. It is inconsistent with the very structure of our constitutional Government. Moreover, it rests upon the erroneous premise that an impeachment trial is a criminal proceeding. Respondent's view has been considered and rejected by the Senate, as well as by numerous distinguished constitutional scholars. If an impeachment trial is deemed a criminal proceeding, a wrenching and unwarranted departure from two centuries of our nation's consitutional history would ensue, affecting far more than the instant case.

A. The Constitutional Doctrine of Separation of Powers mandates an impeachment process that is separate and independent of the Judicial Branch

A fatal flaw with Respondent's double jeopardy argument is its incompatibility with the very structure of our Government. Respondent contends that the Senate is bound by a jury verdict of acquittal and, therefore, it must dismiss the Articles of Impeachment. Neither the Senate nor the House of Representatives, however, can defer to the Judicial Branch in a matter which is within its unique constitutional responsibility. The doctrine of separation of powers and the system of checks and balances established by our Constitution require the Congress to exercise its independent judgment in an impeachment proceeding, irrespective of the outcome of a prior criminal or civil case.

As the Supreme Court recently stated,

"This Court consistently has given voice to, and has reaffirmed, the central judgment of the Framers of the Constitution that, within our political scheme, the separation of governmental powers into three coordinate Branches is essential to the preservation of liberty." [3]

It is beyond dispute that the Framers set up a system of checks and balances to ensure that no branch of the Federal Government becomes too powerful and that all are held accountable.[4] For example, legislation passed by Congress can be vetoed by the President and is subject to a review of its constitutionality by the courts. Similarly, Senate confirmation is a precondition to Presidential appointment of Federal judges, and the sole check on lifetime tenure in office is Congress' impeachment power. Even when a Federal judge is convicted of a crime, he or she cannot be removed from office without Senate action.

Respondent asks the Senate to ignore this system, to disrupt the checks and balances crafted by the Framers, by allowing a jury to have the final say on whether a Federal judge should remain on the bench. The Framers, however, rejected such a result. They specifically bypassed the Judicial Branch in favor of the Senate when determining what body should be vested with the power to remove Federal officials.[5]

The doctrine of separation of powers also prohibits the Senate from delegating to the Judicial Branch its impeachment authority. The Supreme Court has emphasized that neither the Judicial Branch, nor any other branch of the Federal Government may be "assigned nor allowed 'tasks that are more appropriately accomplished by [other] branches.'" [6] As stated by the Court,

"That this system of division and separation of powers produces conflicts, confusion, and discordance at times is inherent, but it was deliberately so structured to assure full, vigorous and open debate on the great issues affecting the people and to provide avenues for the operation of checks on the exercise of governmental power." [7]

In two analogous situations, the Senate has recognized these fundamental constitutional principles and refused to defer to a decision of the Judicial Branch in lieu of exercising its unique constitutional responsibility. In the impeachment trial of Judge Harry Claiborne, the House asked the Senate to apply the doctrine of collateral estoppel by accepting as true the facts found in Judge Claiborne's criminal case, which in turn supported conviction on the articles of Impeachment.[8] The Senate Impeachment Trial Committee refused to rely on the judicial findings. The Chairman of the Committee, Senator Charles Mathias, stated:

"The managers ask the Senate to bind itself to the judgment of the courts of the United States . . . Now, there might be very compelling considerations if the Senate were simply sitting as another court, but the evidence is that the framers of the Constitution deliberately constructed a system which would result, in Alexander Hamilton's phrase expressed in Federalist No. 65, in a 'double prosecution' . . .

"The Senate has the sole power to try all impeachments." We have no authority to delegate that responsibility to any other branch. Particularly it must be remembered that the Constitutional Convention specifically rejected the idea of conferring on the Supreme Court the power to try impeachments.

"If our obligation to try all impeachments results in the expenditure of our time and resources or creates the possibility that our conclusions may differ from those of the judiciary in exercising our separate constitutional responsibilities, that would be a result of the Framers' design and not of our personal wishes.

"Accordingly, we are obliged to continue and not interrupt our assignment of receiving the evidence which the Senate may later use when it performs its duty as the sole trier of fact in this impeachment." [9]

Similarly, the Senate Select Committee on Ethics emphasized the Senate's responsibility to exercise its independent constitutional authority in its report on a resolution to expel Senator Harrison A. Williams, Jr.[10] The Committee's report explains:

"The committee's unanimous recommendation of expulsion reflects its strong conviction that its own determination of the matter and that of the Senate must be made independently of the jury's verdict, [the court's] ruling on due process motions, and indeed, any action which any court may take with regard to Senator Williams' case." [11]

Likewise, Senator Heflin, who was the ranking minority member of the Senate Ethics Committee in the Williams' case, remarked:

"Many people . . . misunderstand the role of our committee and the nature of disciplinary proceedings.

"When the jury returned a verdict of guilty, many said that should dictate our result; but with out own independent constitutional obligation to discharge with our own standards of conduct and individual concepts of right and wrong, nothing external to this body can ever dictate our result: not prosecutors, not juries, not judges, not appeals courts.

[2] Footnotes appear on end of article.

"While our higher standard makes it highly probable that the conviction of a crime would constitute an ethical impropriety warranting sanctions, that is nonetheless an independent, case-by-case determination.

"Likewise, had Senator Williams been found not quilty or were his conviction to be overturned on an appeal, it would still be possible for him to have violated the Senate's 'Code of Conduct'.

"The Constitutional clearly contemplates, and it would constitute no repugnant result for there to be no conviction but yet expulsion." [12]

The same is true in this case. The Constitution demands that the Senate exercise its independent judgment and not defer to a jury verdict in cases of impeachment. The Senate should not place in the hands of the Judicial Branch its own constitutional authority. The Senate alone has the power to determine whether a Federal judge should remain on the bench.

B. Impeachment Is Not A Criminal Proceeding Warranting Application Of The Double Jeopardy Clause

The Central and explicit premise underlying Respondent's double jeopardy argument is that a Senate impeachment trial is a criminal proceeding. Then, and only then, would principles of double jeopardy apply.[13] The House submits that Respondent's premise is without merit. In fact, his view has been considered and rejected by the Senate, as well as by numerous distinguished constitutional scholars. Impeachment is a remedial proceeding, which is not criminal in nature and, therefore, the doctrine of double jeopardy does not apply.

1. Relevant Legal Analysis Establishes That Principles Of Double Jeopardy Do Not Apply To Impeachment Proceedings

Consideration of Respondent's argument must begin with an analysis of the double jeopardy clause in the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution. The Fifth Amendment provides in pertinent part, ". . . nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb. . . ."

The law governing the applicability of the double jeopardy clause has been extensively developed by the Supreme Court. In Ex Parte Lange,[14] the Court stated:

"The common law not only prohibited a second punishment for the same offense, but it went futher and forbid a second trial for the same offense, whether the accused had suffered punishment or not, and whether in the former trial he had been acquitted or convicted."

Thus the double jeopardy clause applies to all criminal matters irrespective of the outcome of a criminal trial.

It is also settled law that the double jeopardy clause does not apply to non-criminal proceedings, even if those proceedings are based upon the same facts which resulted in a criminal acquittal. In Helvering v. Mitchell,[15] the Supreme Court, per Justice Brandeis, rejected the ideal that the double jeopardy clause barred imposition of a monetary penalty in a subsequent proceeding where a criminal trial based upon the same facts had resulted in an acquittal. An "acquittal on a criminal charge is not a bar to a civil action by the Government, remedial in its nature, arising out of the same facts on which the criminal proceeding was based. . . ." [16] In determining whether the double jeopardy clause applies to a particular proceeding, therefore, the Supreme Court distinguishes between remedial and punitive proceedings.

Numerous proceedings have been deemed remedial in nature, even though the impact of the judgment is highly negative to the financial and personal intersts of the individual involved. In United States v. One Assortment of Firearms,[17] the owner of various firearms had been acquitted in a criminal trial, but the Supreme Court held that the double jeopardy doctrine did not prohibit a subsequent forfeiture proceeding against the firearms involved in the criminal case. In Lewis v. Frick,[18] the defendant's criminal acquittal did not bar subsequent deportation proceedings for the same acts. In Helvering v. Mitchell, the Supreme Court, noting the different standards of proof in criminal and civil proceedings, held that acquittal in a tax evasion trial did not bar a subsequent civil assessment suit. Indeed, double jeopardy has been found not to attach even where confinement may be imposed in the second proceeding.[19]

The threshold question, therefore, is whether an impeachment proceeding is essentially remedial in nature and thereby unaffected by the double jeopardy clause, or is a criminal, punitive proceeding to which the double jeopardy applies. A review of the text of the Constitution, the historical evidence, and analysis by distinguished scholars and experts in the field of constitutional law, leads to the conclusion that the Framers did not intend impeachment to be criminal in nature and the sanctions are remedial rather than punitive.

a. The Framers Intended Impeachment To Be A Non-Criminal Proceeding

The first source for determining the intent of the Framers regarding the nature of impeachment is the Constitutional language itself. Article I, Section 3, Clause 7 of the Constitution, known as the impeachment judgment clause, provides:

"Judgment in cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of Honor, Trust or Profit under the United States: but the Party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment according to Law."

The House submits that this language alone establishes that the essential nature of impeachment is non-criminal, that the sanction is remedial rather than punitive, and that impeachment proceedings are outside the scope of the double jeopardy clause.

A persuasive indication of the Framers' intent to establish impeachment as a remedial process is that criminal prosecution remains available following a Senate conviction. In the impeachment judgment clause, the Framers contemplate a dual process where impeachment would be available to remove an offending official from public office, but the Executive Branch would retain its jurisdiction to proceed with a criminal prosecution, if appropriate. Alexander Hamilton commented on this feature of the Constitution in the Federalist, No. 65 during his discussion of the appropriate forum for an impeachment trial. Hamilton wrote that the judiciary was ill-suited to serve as a court of impeachment because the accused would then lose the benefit of his "double trial," in that the same branch of government would have jurisdiction over both the impeachment and the criminal case.[20] In designing a two-part scheme, the Framers implicitly acknowledged that impeachment and criminal prosection are independent and that the latter is not a substitute for the former.

In addition to the impeachment judgment clause, there are other Constitutional provisions that address the nature of impeachment. A review of these references also indicates that it was not the intent of the Framers for impeachment to be considered a criminal proceeding.[21]

For example, even though impeachment is grouped with "Crimes" and "offenses" in two provisions of our Constitution, it is mentioned solely for the purpose of excluding impeachment from the protections created for criminal matters in those provisions. Thus the Constitution treats impeachment separately from criminal proceedings. There is no right to a jury trial in an impeachment, while a right to trial by jury is a fundamental precept of our criminal jurisprudence. The President cannot pardon the official convicted in an impeachment proceeding, a power the President has in criminal cases.

It is true that some language of the Constitution suggests connections between impeachment and the criminal process. Thus, the Senate "convicts" in an impeachment trial and the standard for impeachable conduct—"Treason, bribery or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors"—suggests criminal activity.[22] These references, however, stem from the fact that the English system of impeachment, to a limited extent, served as a model for the Framers. Only certain aspects of the English model were adopted; in other critical respects the English model was rejected, rendering the American impeachment a remedial process.

English impeachments were unquestionably criminal proceedings even though they did not require an indictable crime.[23] Impeachment in England was a "double-edged sword; it was used not only to sever a man from his office, but also his head from his body." [24] This was the great watershed distinction between the English and American practices:

"One thing that the writers of the American Constitution made clear, however, was that no matter how much they were following the footsteps of their English predecessors, the impeachment process was not to be the alternative to, or a substitute for, criminal proceedings. They did this both by restricting the sanctions that might be applied to removal from office and also by providing that conviction on impeachment did not preclude further ordinary criminal proceedings.

"This basic difference between the American and the English processes requires that the English precedents be scrutinized with a wary eye. For in many ways the English procedures are truly criminal in ways that the American procedures clearly are not." [25]

Impeachment is also distinguished from criminal proceedings in the way that it is initiated and tried. As established by the Framers in Article I, Section 2, Clause 5, the House of Representatives initiates an impeachment trial by way of articles, rather than by a grand jury returning an indictment. It is the Senate, not courts of law, that has jurisdiction over impeachment trials.

This separation of functions between impeachment and criminal proceedings has been commented upon many times by some of the most distinguished constitutional scholars in our nation's history. Repeatedly, they reach the same fundamental conclusion: the purpose of impeachment is not to punish an individual, but to protect the institutions of government from persons who have abused their positions of public trust. That protection is effected by removing such federal officials from office and, in some instances, barring them from holding future office. This analysis also supports the conclusion that, as established by the Framers, impeachment is a non-criminal proceeding.

One can begin with Hamilton's explication of the Constitution's impeachment provisions in The Federalist, No. 65:

"A well-constituted court for the trial of impeachments is an object not more to be desired than difficult to be obtained in a government wholly elective. The subjects of its jurisdiction are those offences which proceed from the misconduct of public men or, in other words, from the abuse or violation of some public trust. They are of a nature which may with peculiar propriety be denominated Political as they relate chiefly to injuries done immediately to the society itself. . . .

What, it may be asked, is the true spirit of the institution itself? Is it not designed as a method of National Inquest into the conduct of public men?[26]

Thus the essence of the offense for which impeachment is appropriate is not merely criminal activity, but rather such conduct which constitutes "the abuse or violation of some public trust." Hamilton went on to state that only the Senate would be sufficiently "unawed or uninfluenced" to serve as a tribunal for an impeachment.[27]

Professor Philip Kurland, in analyzing Hamiltion's writings in the The Federalist, No. 65, observed:

"There is certainly not to be found here any intimation that the function of impeachment is to afford a tribunal for the trial of criminal offenses. Hamilton is rather suggesting that the reason for not utilizing a court for the trial of impeachments is exactly because the issues are so different from those that are meet for the ordinary criminal law processes."[28]

Similarly, Justice Joseph Story, writing in 1833, spoke of impeachment as "a proceeding purely of a political nature. It is not so much designed to punish an offender as to secure the state against gross official misdemeanors. It touches neither his person nor his property, but simply divests him of his political capacity."[29]

Justice Story's comments echo the words of James Wilson, generally viewed as the finest legal mind at the Constitutional Convention. Wilson wrote:

"[I]mpeachments . . . come not . . . within the sphere or ordinary jurisprudence. They are founded on different principles, are governed by different maxims, and are directed to different objects, for this reason, the trial and punishment of an offense on an impeachment, is no bar to a trial and punishment of the same offense at common law."[30]

In his writings, Wilson also stated that impeachment was "confined to political characters, to political crimes and misdemeanors and to political punishments."[31]

Modern scholars and commentators have examined the issue of the non-criminal nature of impeachment. Like the early commentators, they too have concluded uniformly that impeachments are intended to protect the institutions of government from abuses of the public trust, and were not intended to be criminal proceedings. Impeachment, as established by the Framers, is a remedial process:

"[B]eing a political process, impeachment should not be viewed as a duplication of the criminal process. The impeachment process was designed to be neither a criminal proceeding, nor, in a strictly technical sense, a juridical trial. Removal from office cannot be viewed as criminal punishment or its equivalent. To hold otherwise would be to assume that an office holder was possessed of an indefeasible property interest in the office.[32]

Professor Raoul Berger, when replying to the argument advanced by former President Nixon's counsel that our impeachment process is criminal in nature, wrote:

"When [President Nixon's counsel] emphasizes the criminal nature of impeachment in England, he overlooks that there it was part and parcel of a criminal proceeding. The separation of the two in our Constitution demands a construction of impeachment in non-criminal terms lest it fall afoul of other constitutional provisions.

"First, there is double jeopardy. Were impeachment criminal in nature . . . a conviction or acquittal on impeachment would bar a criminal indictment and a prior conviction or acquittal on indictment an impeachment, for no man can be tried twice for the same offense. Both [James] Wilson and [Justice] Story were aware of the play of double jeopardy in the Constitutional provision. The Framers meant to have both impeachment and indictment available, not to put Congress to a choice between either one or the other."[33]

Similarly, Professor Kurland made the following observations about the remedial nature of impeachment:

"It is not insignificant that the concern of the Convention from the beginning and throughout was centerd on a means for removal from office and not on punishment for misbehavior.

* * * * *

"The purpose of the [impeachment] provision is clear. It is not punishment of an individual for criminal activity, but removal from office for abuse of authority."[34]

In his Memorandum, Respondent argues the opposite conclusion. He contends that the language of the Constitution suggests that impeachment is a criminal proceeding and, therefore, principles of double jeopardy apply. His analysis of the Framers' intent is without support.

In his memorandum, Respondent relies on the impeachment judgment clause. He argues that this constitutional provision establishes one exception to the prohibition against double jeopardy, which covers the case of a"convicted" official. The Constitution, he contends, "creates an express exception for a 'party convicted' of an impeachable offense. It creates no exception for a party acquitted."[35]

Respondent is forced to take this position regarding the Framers' intent because otherwise his double jeopardy argument would create the anomaly of prohibiting impeachments following the criminal conviction of civil officers. Thus it would mean that Harry Claiborne should be returned to the bench, indeed that he never was constitutionally removed from office. It would also mean that the pending impeachment inquiry involving Judge Walter Nixon, who is currently in jail serving a sentence for conviction on two counts of perjury, should be terminated. If the impeachment process is a criminal proceeding, they too should not be subjected to another trial.

Recognizing the dilemma created by his thesis, Respondent is forced to take wholly novel and unsupported position which twists the language of the Constitution. No tailor can cut the constitutional fabric to fit this argument. The fallacy of his analysis is apparent on its face, for the term "party convicted" in the impeachment judgment clause clearly refers to civil officers who impeachment trial has resulted in conviction. It has nothing to do with judgments in a criminal proceeding. It offers not support to Respondent's anomalous contention that persons acquitted in a criminal trial are protected by the double jeopardy clause, while those convicted are subject to a subsequent impeachment proceeding.

Contrary to Respondent's assertion, the language of the Constitution establishes that impeachment is a remedial proceeding. The specfic constitutional provision that criminal prosecution could follow an impeachment conviction, the functional distinctions between impeachments and criminal trials, and the analysis of Constitutional scholars all establish beyond reasonable question the intent of the Framers to create a remedial, non-criminal impeachment proceeding.[36]

b. The history of the Double Jeopardy Clause Does Not Support Respondent's Argument

Respondent also asserts that the adoption of the Constitutional amendment embodying the double jeopardy clause supports the conclusion that the Framers intended impeachment to be a criminal proceeding subject to the principles of double jeopardy. A review of that history, however, demonstrates this is not the case.

In the House of Representatives, James Madison offered a series of constitutional amendments which included the following proposition:

"No person shall be subject, except in cases of impeachment, to more than one punishment or one trial for the same offense; nor shall be compelled to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor be obliged to relinquish his property, where it may be necesssary for public use, without a just compensation."[37]

This proposition was taken up and debated by a Committee of the Whole of the House of Representatives. None of the debate referred to the clause "except in cases of impeachment."[38] Madison's proposal, with some amendments, was adopted by the House on August 20, 1789 and was included in the double jeopardy clause reported from the House to the Senate.[39]

According to an entry in the Senate Journal from September 4, 1789, the proposal was further amended by the Senate as follows:

"The eighth article was then considered, and after a successful motion to strike out these words: 'except in case of impeachment, to more than one trial, or one punishment; and substitute these words: 'be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb by any public prosecution;' it was agreed to."[40]

There is no history of any debate on this amendment. As adopted by both houses, the language read: ". . . nor shall any person be subject for the same offense, to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb. . . ."

On the basis of this history, Respondent argues that the deletion of the specific language exempting impeachment from the double jeopardy clause reflects a decision to leave impeachment within those cases covered by the double jeopardy provision. There is no history or commentary to support this position.

It is, in the view of the House, substantially more likely that the deletion of the specific exemption for impeachment from the double jeopardy clause, reflects no more than a removal of language deemed unnecessary in view of the existing provisions of the Constitution which had already taken impeachment outside the scope of double jeopardy.

In this connection, it is noteworthy that Madison's seventh proposition also had a reference to impeachment which was deleted prior to final adoption of the Amendments. There, as with the double jeopardy provision, impeachment was initially specifically excluded as a proceeding to which the right to trial by jury would attach. That proposition, which stated basic safeguards accompanying criminal trials, was as follows:

"The trial of all crimes (except in cases of impeachments, and cases arising in the land or naval forces, or the militia when on actual service, in time of war or public danger) shall be by an impartial jury of freeholders of the vicinage, with the requisite of unanimity for conviction, of the right of challenge, and other accustomed requisites; and in all crimes punishable with loss of life or member, presentment or indictment by a grand jury shall be an essential preliminary. . . ." [41]

In the final version of the amendments, the explicit exception for cases arising in the military was retained, but the exception for impeachments was deleted.[42] It is reasonable to assume that with regard to both the protection against double jeopardy and the right to trial by jury, the drafters of the Bill of Rights were of the opinion that it was obvious from the terms of the Constitution that those rights guaranteed by the Fifth and Sixth Amendments in all criminal matters, were not applicable to impeachment trials. Therefore both the original language of the Constitution and the amendments made to the Constitution by the First Congress reflect an understanding on the part of the Framers that impeachment was not a criminal proceeding subject to the principles of double jeopardy.

c. The Constitutional Sanctions for Impeachable Conduct Are Not Punitive

The House submits that the evidence of the Framers' intent that impeachment be a non-criminal proceeding and not subject to double jeopardy principles is compelling and conclusive. However, even if this intent were found to be ambiguous, application of the established judicial test to determine whether double jeopardy principles are applicable would lead to the same conclusion.

When determining whether a statutory or regulatory proceeding is criminal in nature, and therefore subject to the protections of the double jeopardy clause, the courts look beyond the intent of the drafters to determine whether the sanctions imposed in the particular proceeding are such that the proceeding itself must be considered punitive rather than remedial.[43] Here, the question is whether the sanctions imposed by the Senate upon conviction of an impeachable offense are such that impeachment must be considered punitive. The answer is no. Indeed, the sanctions established by the Constitution for impeachable conduct reinforce the conclusion that impeachment is non-criminal in nature. For this additional reason, Respondent's double jeopardy argument fails.

In the Constitution, the Framers established limited sanctions for a Federal official found guilty of an impeachable offense. Article II, Section 3 provides that the Senate's only remedy upon conviction on an Article of Impeachment is "removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust or Profit under the United States."

On their face, these sanctions are not punitive. Removal from office and future disqualification are remedies unique to impeachment proceedings; they cannot be imposed by any court as a punishment for criminal conduct. They affect only a limited number of individuals (the President, Vice President and civil officers of the United States) and relate only to their continued or future tenure in Federal office. In addition, the remedies afforded the Senate focus on the needs of the public and the nation rather than on punishment of the accused individual. Unlike a criminal proceeding where the sentence imposed must be relative to the crime, in cases of impeachment only the remedies of removal and disqualification are available, no matter how serious the offense.

In addition, consideration of other factors suggested by the Supreme Court indicate that the impeachment sanctions are remedial. The Supreme Court has characterized proceedings as remedial even if the impact of the sanction imposed has a significant detrimental impact on the individual involved.[44] Thus, courts have permitted disbarment and licensing revocation proceedings following a criminal acquittal on the same facts—proceedings which carry sanctions that may destroy an individual's employment opportunities and reputation.[45] Likewise, the Supreme Court has held that deportation, which imposes the most wrenching of disabilities, separating the subject from family, friends, and livelihood, is not a punitive sanction.[46]

Moreover, impeachment sanctions share the characteristics of a remedial or regulatory sanction: they have not been historically regarded as punishment; nor do they require that the conduct be criminally proscribed; and removal and disqualification are tailored to protect the public trust. No more appropriate remedy could be fashioned to accomplish that limited purpose.

2. Both the House and the Senate Have Recognized the Non-Criminal Nature of Impeachment

Finally, Respondent's fundamental premise that impeachment is a criminal proceeding has been rejected by both the House and the Senate. For this reason too, Respondent's double jeopardy argument fails.

Over a hundred years ago, in 1873, the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives had occasion to explore the nature of impeachment and the sanctions of removal in a report issued in the impeachment inquiry of Vice President Colfax. The report explains:

"Your committee, therefore, are led to inquire, what is the nature and what the objects of impeachment under our Constitution?

"Are they punitive or remedial? . . . Your committee are very strongly inclined to the opinion that impeachment was intended by the framers of the Constitution to be wholly remedial and not punitive, except as an incident to the judgment, because we find that the Constitution limits the judgment in impeachment by strongly restrictive words . . . .

". . . [W]e find impeachment to be remedial in this, that it only provides as a further consequence disqualification for office, by which the evil is cured . . . .

"We are also inclined to believe that proceedings of impeachment were intended to be remedial and not punitive, because we have already seen that if punitive at all an entirely inadequate punishment has been provided by the judgment; because the very highest offenses are triable by impeachment, such as treason and bribery, and the sentence may be only removal from an office whose term extends for a few days only, as in the case under consideration." [47]

More recently, during the impeachment inquiry into the conduct of former President Nixon, the difference between impeachment and the criminal law was expressed thus:

"Impeachment and the criminal law serve fundamentally different purposes. Impeachment is the first step in remedial process—removal from office and possible disqualifications from holding future office. The purpose of impeachment is not personal punishment; its function is primarily to maintain constitutional government. Furthermore, the Constitution itself provides that impeachment is no substitute for the ordinary process of criminal law since it specifies that impeachment does not immunize the officer from criminal liability for his wrongdoing." [48]

In the Claiborne impeachment trial, the Senate recognized the distinction between impeachment and criminal proceedings when it determined that the criminal standard of proof—beyond a reasonable doubt—does not necessarily apply in an impeachment trial.[49]

Finally, in the recent Report of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration on what procedures to employ in the impeachment case of Respondent, the issue of the nature of impeachment was considered. The Committee stated:

"Most important, it must be remembered that an impeachment should not be viewed as a criminal prosecution. 'The impeachment process was designed to be neither a criminal proceeding, nor in strictly technical sense, a juridical trial.' Hamilton characterized it as a method of 'National Inquest' into the conduct of public men.

"The proposition that impeachment proceedings are not criminal trials is also evident from previous actions of this Committee. In 1974, the Rules Committee held hearings on the subject of whether the Senate Impeachment Rules would be revised. Among the proposals presented to the Committee was one by Senator Mansfield which set out comprehensive, detailed rules of procedure which were 'substantially modeled' on the civil and criminal rules of procedure for federal courts. The Committee did not adopt the Mansfield proposal; instead it made minor changes in the existing rules.

"One change made by the Committee is particularly important. Rule VIII was amended to substitute the words 'person impeached' for 'person accused' or 'accused.' The report explains that '. . . there was a general feeling among the members of the Committee that the language of the rules should accord with the sui generis nature of impeachment and should, therefore, avoid terminology closely allied with criminal proceedings.' "

"There are many distinctions between an impeachment and a criminal prosecution. For example, Senators are both judge and jury, and admissibility of evidence may be determined by vote of the Senate. Members, not the parties, decide if Members are qualified to hear the case, and Senators have an unlimited right to pose written questions to witnesses and counsel. Also, during the Claiborne trial, the Senate rejected a motion that would have imposed on all Members a single standard of proof for conviction.

"In the Claiborne case, both the impeachment committee and the full Senate rejected the motion that they were in any sense bound by the outcome of the criminal prosecution against Judge Claiborne. The Constitution provides further evidence that this view is consistent with that of its authors where it specifically permits criminal prosecution of a person impeached. In any event, in view of the foregoing, the acquittal of the respondent is irrelevant to the questions before this Committee." [50]

Thus not only the relevant legal analysis and historical precedent establish that impeachment is a remedial proceeding, but also the House and Senate have reached the same conclusion in this and other proceedings.

There is no basis for Respondent's assertion that impeachment is a criminal proceeding requiring the application of principles of double jeopardy. History makes clear that the Framers intended impeachment to be a remedial proceeding, serving the important purpose of preserving the integrity of Federal office to the benefit of the public. The legal analysis adopted by the Supreme Court also demonstrates that impeachment is remedial and, therefore, double jeopardy does not apply. In addition, the Senate and the House have adopted this view of impeachment proceedings.

Accordingly, the Senate should reject Respondent's argument that the doctrine of double jeopardy requires the Senate to dismiss Articles I through XV of the Articles of Impeachment.

IV. THERE HAS BEEN NO UNWARRANTED DELAY BETWEEN THE ALLEGED OFFENSES AND RESPONDENT'S IMPEACHMENT

In his Motion to Dismiss Articles I through XV, Respondent also asserts that dismissal of these articles is warranted due to the lapse of time between the alleged offenses and his impeachment by the House of Representatives. The offense charged in Article I, the alleged bribery conspiracy between Judge Hastings and William Borders, occurred in 1981. The offenses charged in Articles II through XV, the alleged perjury committed by Judge Hastings at his criminal trial, occurred in February 1983. Seven and five years later respectively, on August 3, 1988, the House of Representatives impeached Judge Hastings for these and other offenses.

There is no statute of limitations applicable to articles of impeachment, for neither the Constitution nor House or Senate rules require that articles be adopted by the House or presented to the Senate within any particular length of time.[51] Therefore, there is no support for the assertion that, as a matter of law, Articles I through XV should be dismissed due to the seven and five years that have passed since the commission of the offenses. Rather, Judge Hastings must be raising the equivalent of an equitable defense of laches—that the House of Representatives is guilty of inexcusable and unreasonable delay prejudicial to the respondent in this impeachment proceeding.[52] The House takes issue, however, with Respondent's assertion that the House of Representatives unreasonably delayed this case.

Assuming, arguendo, that a laches defense were to apply to the House of Representatives,[53] Respondent's delay argument has no merit. First, the time period between the commission of the alleged offenses and Judge Hastings' impeachment falls well within the bounds of precedent in prior impeachments. Second, the adoption of Articles I through XV was timely, proceeding in accordance with the procedures established by Congress in the Judicial Councils Reform and Judicial Conduct and Disability Act of 1980 (hereinafter referred to as "1980 Act"). Finally, much of the time lapse stems from litigation initiated by Respondent or engendered by his opposition to the disclosure of grand jury and other documents.

A. Historic Precedent Refutes Respondent's Argument of Delay

In the American experience, there have been at least three impeachment proceedings in which the time between the charged offenses and the adoption of articles was the same or greater than the five and seven years at issue in this case. In the impeachment of Judge Charles Swayne, two of the six articles alleged offenses that occurred more than twelve years prior to the impeachment.[54] Similarly, in the impeachment of Judge Halsted Ritter, the alleged offenses occurred five to seven years prior to the House of Representatives' adoption of articles.[55] Most recently, in the impeachment of Judge Harry Claiborne, the offense alleged in Article I occurred on June 15, 1980, six years before the House adopted the article on July 22, 1986.[56] In short, the Senate has never dismissed Articles of Impeachment on the basis of unwarranted delay.

B. The Time Between The Alleged Misconduct And Impeachment Was Reasonable And Justified

When a court is presented with a delay defense, it looks at all the factors or circumstances relevant to the given case in order to determine its validity.[57] Here there has been no unreasonable or inexcusable delay by the House of Representatives. In fact, just the opposite is true.

Article I focuses on the bribery conspiracy which took place in 1981. Articles II through XV focus on the false testimony that occurred at Judge Hastings' criminal trial in February, 1983. The delay between Respondent's indictment on December 29, 1981 and his trial in February 1983 is largely attributable to a motion to dismiss, filed by Judge Hastings, which alleged that a federal judge must be impeached prior to a criminal prosecution. Judge Gignoux, the trial judge in the case, denied Respondent's motion and severed Respondent's trial from that of co-defendant Borders in order to allow Respondent to pursue an interlocutory appeal. Judge Gignoux's decision was affirmed by the Eleventh Circuit. The appeal by Judge Hastings delayed his trial for eleven months.

Immediately following Judge Hastings' trial, on March 17, 1983, William Terrell Hodges, Chief Judge of the United States District Court for the Middle District of Florida, and Anthony A. Alaimo, Chief Judge of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Georgia, filed a complaint with the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit. The complaint was initiated under 28 U.S.C. 372(c) of the 1980 Act. The Chief Judge of the Eleventh Circuit thereupon appointed an Investigating Committee, consisting of five judges. Litigation initiated by Judge Hastings or engendered by his opposition to the Investigating Committee's efforts to obtain documents and testimony delayed the Investigating Committee's hearings and other fact finding for over a year and a half: Judge Hastings challenged the constitutionality of the 1980 Act and the statutory authority of the Investigating Committee, he opposed the Investigating Committee's attempt to obtain grand jury materials from his criminal case, and he opposed the Investigating Committee's motion to compel the testimony of witnesses who asserted a "judicial privilege" based on their employment by Judge Hastings. Judge Hastings lost all of these points, but the litigation effectively stalled the investigation.[58]

On August 4, 1986, the Investigating Committee submitted its report and recommendation to the Judicial Council for the Eleventh Circuit and, on August 29, 1986, the Judicial Council adopted a resolution in which it accepted and approved the report. Four days later, on September 2, 1986, the Eleventh Circuit certified the Hastings matter to the Judicial Conference of the United States, after which, on September 17, 1986, the Judicial Conference invited Judge Hastings to respond.

Thereafter, on March 17, 1987, Chief Justice Rehnquist, acting on behalf of the Judicial Conference, transmitted to the Speaker of the House of Representatives a certification that, in language taken from 28 U.S.C. 372(c), the Judicial Conference had determined that Judge Hastings had "engaged in conduct which might constitute one or more grounds for impeachment." The certification and the accompanying report of the Investigating Committee were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary on March 23, 1987. The Committee, in turn, referred the inquiry into the conduct of Judge Hastings to the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice.

Less than a year and a half passed between the time the inquiry reached the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice and the adoption of Articles of Impeachment by the House of Representatives. Again, litigation made necessary by Judge Hastings' opposition to the Judiciary Committee's efforts to obtain relevant documents delayed the inquiry: Judge Hastings opposed the Committee on the Judiciary's requests for access to the grand jury materials in Judge Hastings' bribery conspiracy case and other documents that were under court-ordered seal in the wiretap matter.[59] Ultimately, the litigation was resolved by the courts in favor of the Committee.[60] The litigation ended on April 18, 1988. One month later, on May 18, 1988, the Subcommittee on Criminal Justice began its hearings. After an exhaustive independent investigation of the facts, including seven days of Subcommittee hearings, the House of Representatives adopted Articles of Impeachment on August 3, 1988.

This chronology demonstrates that the time that elapsed between the commission of the offenses charged in Articles I through XV and Judge Hastings' impeachment is a product of two factors: the litigation occasioned by Judge Hastings' objections to the investigations, and the diligence and care with which the various institutions involved in this matter have handled the inquiry. Each institution efficiently handled its own investigation and reached a decision in a timely manner.

Respondent ignores these facts and argues that there is no compelling justification for the time delay because all the evidence relied upon by the House has been in existence since 1983.[61] He also argues that because Congress did not delegate its impeachment power to the Federal judiciary in the 1980 Act, proceedings conducted pursuant to that Act do not justify the time that has elasped between the commission of the alleged offenses and his impeachment.[62]

Respondent is wrong on both counts. First, the fact that evidence has been in existence since Judge Hastings' arrest and criminal trial does not require the House of Representatives to impeach him immediately. There is no such constitutional requirement and, as illustrated by the investigation conducted by the Eleventh Circuit, a thorough and unbiased study of the allegations is advisable although time consuming. This is especially true in a case such as this, in which the respondent challenges in court many aspects of the judicial and congressional investigations. The careful review of this case by various institutions of Government is to ensure that justice is done.

Second, the fact that Congress established in the 1980 Act a procedure through which the Federal Judiciary may conduct an investigation prior to that of the House of Representatives in no way justifies the dismissal of subsequent Articles of Impeachment. The Act establishes a mechanism through which any citizen can initiate a complaint and a respondent's own peers review the allegations. Using such a procedure weeds out frivolous complaints and creates an initial record from which the House may launch its own investigation. The House, of course, may proceed with an impeachment without a Judicial investigation. Respondent, however, is arguing that the House is required to bypass the very mechanism created by Congress to investigate claims against Federal judges. This is an untenable position.[63]

Respondent's assertion of unjustifiable delay is without merit. The same must be said about his claim that he has been prejudiced by delay. He alleges that Articles I through XV should be dismissed because both witnesses and documents have become unavailable, and because recollections have dimmed.[64] What Respondent fails to mention, however, is that nearly all of the witnesses who will testify with respect to Articles I through XV have testified under oath in other proceedings.[65] The House will stipulate to the authenticity of this testimony. Three of the unavailable witnesses named by Respondent, Santo Trafficante, Joseph Nesline and Andrew Mavrides, were not called by either party at Respondent's criminal trial, nor does Respondent explain in any detail why their testimony is now so "crucial" to his defense. The other two unavailable witnesses listed by Respondent are Alvoyd Merritt and Frank Romano. Both testified at Judge Hastings' criminal trial and the House will stipulate to the authenticity of their testimony.[66]

C. A Defense of Unwarranted Delay Does Not Apply to the House of Representatives

Finally, Respondent's Motion to Dismiss on the basis of laches has no merit because the doctrine does not even apply to the Federal Government.[67] As explained by Justice Stone,

"The true reason [for this rule] '* * * is to be found in the great public policy of preserving the public rights, revenues, and property from injury and loss, by the negligence of public officers * * *' The rule is supportable now because its benefit and advantage extend to every citizen, including the defendant, whose plea of laches or limitation it precludes; and its uniform survival in the United States has been generally accounted for and justified on grounds of policy." [68]

In short, a defense of unreasonable delay does not apply to the United States in a suit to enforce a public right or protect the public interest because the right or interest at stake in the litigation is preeminent.[69]

Here, the House of Representatives seeks to protect a vital public interest—the integrity of the Federal judiciary. The House, as part of the Federal Government, is pursuing a public benefit that cannot be compromised or forfeited by an allegation of delay, particularly where Respondent's own actions have hindered the progress of the investigation. For this reason, the Senate need not even consider the amount of time between the commission of the charged offenses and Judge Hastings' impeachment. In any event, there has been no unwarranted delay in this case requiring the dismissal of Articles I through XV.

V. CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Senate should reject Respondent's motion and proceed with an impeachment trial on all seventeen Articles of Impeachment presented by the House of Representatives. There is nothing "unfair" about conducting a trial and removing a judge who tried to sell his office and then managed to obtain an acquittal in a criminal case by repeatedly and knowingly offering false testimony under oath. Respondent's own misconduct on the witness stand resulted in a perversion of the legal process in his criminal trial. He cannot be permitted to profit further from that misconduct in this proceeding.

Accordingly, the Managers respectfully request that the Senate deny Respondent's Motion to Dismiss Articles I through XV.

In Judge Claiborne's criminal case, the jury found beyond a reasonable doubt that the judge had committed the crimes alleged. In other words, the jury was convinced that the evidence satisfied the stringent standard of proof applied in criminal proceedings. In contrast, in Respondent's criminal case, all the jury found was that there was a "reasonable doubt" as to Respondent's guilt. It did not determine that the evidence presented established his innocence.

Moreover, it should not be forgotten that in a separate trial William Borders was convicted of conspiring with Respondent to obtain a bribe. For the jury to reach that conclusion, it must have determined, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Judge Hastings participated in the bribery scheme.

[10] This situation is analogous to that of impeachment because the Senate's authority to expel its members also derives directly from a Constitutional provision independent of Executive Branch authority to prosecute a crime. See Article I, Section 5.

[21] The other Constitutional provisions that address impeachment are:

Article I, Section 2, Clause 5: "The House of Representatives . . . shall have the sole Power of Impeachment."

Article I, Section 3, Clause 6: "The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments. When sitting for that Purpose, they shall be on Oath or Affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no Person shall be convicted without the Concurrence of two thirds of the Members present."

Article II, Section 2, Clause 1: "The President . . . shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for offenses against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment."

Article II, Section 4: "The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors."

Article III, Section 2, Clause 3: "The Trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by Jury;. . . ."

[22] Article II, Section 4.

[23] The term "High Crimes and Misdemeanors," in fact, is not limited to criminal to criminal activity. At the time of the drafting of the Constitution, the term incorporated misconduct that was not subject to criminal prosecution. In the American experience, ten officials impeached by the House of Representatives were accused of misconduct that did not constitute a crime.

As Senator Byrd recently explained: ". . . "[H]igh Crimes and Misdemeanors" appear to be words of art confined to impeachments, without roots in the ordinary criminal law and which had no relation to whether an indictment would lie in the particular circumstances." Cong. Rec. S. 8380 (June 19, 1987).

At least one scholarly work on impeachment posits that the English influence was substantially less than is generally credited and points out the fundamental differences between the English and American concepts of impeachment. For example, Parliament refused to limit its jurisdiction by defining impeachable offenses, while the Framers of the Constitution labored to define impeachable offenses with precision. Only officeholders could be impeached under the federal provisions, while in England, only the royal family was immune from impeachment. In England, the House of Lords could convict by a bare majority. In the American Constitution, the unique formula of "two thirds of the members present" became the rule. Finally, and perhaps most importantly, the House of Lords could order any punishment upon conviction including death. The delegates to the Convention limited themselves to non-criminal remedies which could not be imposed by any regular court. See Hoffer and Hull, Impeachment in America, 1635-1805 (Yale 1984).

[36] The original report and recommendation of the Eleventh Circuit Investigating Committee in the instant case, which was approved by the Judicial Council of the Eleventh Circuit, specifically addressed the issue of whether double jeopardy would bar an impeachment after acquittal in a criminal case. The five distinguished judges who sat on the Investigating Committee unanimously concluded that principles of double jeopardy did not apply. See Appendic I, Serial No. 11, In the Matter of the Impeachment of U.S. District Judge Alcee L. Hastings, at 347.

The basis for the Investigating Committee's conclusion echoes many of the grounds set forth above. The Committee pointed out,". . . impeachment does not serve the same purpose as a criminal prosecution. Impeachment is remedial and designed to product the institution of government from corrupt conduct; conduct that subverts the foundations upon which such institutions rest, namely the trust of the people in the integrity of the constitutional officers of the United States Government. This different is an important reason why double jeopardy principles are not applied to an impeachment proceeding." Id. at 348.

"Art. VII. [Fifth Amendment] No person shall be held to answer for a capital for otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service, in time of war or public danger. . . .

"Art. VIII [Sixth Amendment] In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law; and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

[58] The Investigating Committee initiated efforts to obtain grand jury records in June, 1983. Judge Hastings' opposition prevented the Committee from gaining access to those records until October, 1984. In May, 1985, the Investigating Committee sought the testimony of Judge Hastings' law clerks and secretary. Judge Hastings opposed the subpoenas. His opposition delayed the Witness' appearance before the Investigating Committee until July, 1986.

[59] The litigation over the Committee's access to the bribery conspiracy materials delayed its review of those documents for approximately five months, from July to December 1987. Respondent's opposition to the Committee's access to documents in the wiretap matter delayed the Committee's review of those documents for approximately seven months, from September 1987 to April 1988.

APPENDIX—STATEMENT OF FACTS

The Committee, based on its independent inquiry into the conduct of Judge Hastings, finds the following facts.

A. BRIBERY CONSPIRACY

1. Background

On October 22, 1979, Alcee L. Hastings was sworn in as a United States District Judge for the Southern District of Florida. Both William A. Borders, Jr., then a Washington, D.C. attorney, and Hemphill Pride, a mutual friend of Mr. Borders and Judge Hastings, attended Judge Hastings' investiture ceremony. At the time of the swearing in, Mr. Borders and Judge Hastings had known each other for approximately 16 years. They were political allies and social friends. Hemphill Pride was a friend of both men, but he was particularly close to Judge Hastings. Mr. Pride had known Judge Hastings since the early 1960's when they were in law school together in Florida. After graduation, Mr. Pride had returned to South Carolina to practice law.

In 1977, Mr. Pride was convicted in South Carolina of misusing funds in a federally subsidized housing project. As a result of his conviction, Mr. Pride was suspended from the practice of law. His conviction was upheld on appeal in December 1979, not long after Judge Hastings became a federal district judge. During the time Mr. Pride's case was on appeal, Mr. Borders permitted Mr. Pride to live rent-free in an apartment in Washington, D.C. In March 1980, Mr. Pride began serving his sentence at the federal correctional facility at Maxwell Field in Montgomery, Alabama.

On October 16, 1980, Mr. Pride's mother wrote to Judge Hastings and asked his help in arranging an early release for her son. There is no evidence of a replay from Judge Hastings. Mr. Pride testified that while he was in prison he asked Judge Hastings to raise money for him to hire counsel to pursue certain post-conviction relief. According to Mr. Pride, Judge Hastings refused on the grounds that his position as a judge precluded him from doing so.

Mr. Pride was paroled on March 15, 1981 and he immediately began to work at two jobs in Columbia, South Carolina. He could not be employed as a lawyer, however, because he was indefinitely suspended from the practice of law by the Supreme Court of South Carolina. Under South Carolina rules he could not apply for readmission for two years, until May 1983. He also had to take and pass the South Carolina bar examination.

2. The Romano Case

Thomas and Frank Romano were indicted in November 1978 on 21 counts of racketeering, mail and wire fraud, embezzlement and false tax filings. The indictment alleged violations of the Racketeer Influenced Corrupt Organization statute ["RICO"] which, under certain circumstances, could result in the forfeiture of property connected with illegal racketeering activity. The case was assigned to Judge Hastings within the first week he was on the bench.

In December, 1980 the Romano brothers were tried before a jury. The prosecution charged that they had looted a construction project of over a million dollars through various fraudulent means. During the trial, the prosecution made a proffer to Judge Hastings, out of the presence of the jury, that the Romanos had a history of making payoffs.

On December 23, 1980, the jury found the Romanos guilty on all counts. The parties agreed to try the forfeiture issues before Judge Hastings without a jury. Under applicable procedural rules, the court was required to make findings of fact and return a special verdict as to the extent of the property to be forfeited. Judge Hastings heard part of the prosecution's proof on the forfeiture issues on December 30, 1980. He then continued the matter until February 30, 1981 for an evidentiary hearing. He announced that he would proceed to final disposition of the case during the week following the evidentiary hearing.

On December 30, 1980, Marshall Curran, Jr., the lawyer who had represented the Romanos at trial, filed an appeal on their behalf. The Romanos retained a new attorney, Neal Sonnett, to handle their sentencing and appeal.

On February 20, 1981, Judge Hastings concluded the evidentiary hearing on the forfeiture matter. The judge reserved ruling and asked the parties to submit memoranda. Judge Hastings stated that sentencing would not be scheduled in light of the fact that there were to be additional submissions by the parties and the court had not yet received the presentence reports.

On March 13, 1981, the prosecution filed its proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law on the forfeiture issue. On April 6, 1981, the Romanos filed their memorandum of fact and law in opposition to the Government's proposed findings of fact. The next day, April 8, 1981, the Government filed a lengthy memorandum in support of the forfeiture which sought forfeiture of property totalling $1,162,016 in value consisting of four components: (a) the net cash proceeds of certain checks ($305,939); (b) total cash proceeds of certain other checks ($540,000); (c) an investment in the Sea Inn restaurant ($234,061); and (d) a part of the gain realized upon the sale of the restaurant ($82,016).

On April 23, 1981, Judge Hastings' law clerk advised the parties that sentencing in Romano would take place on May 11, 1981. The official Notice of Sentencing was filed on April 28, 1981, setting the sentencing for May 11, at 1:00 p.m.

On May 4, 1981, Judge Hastings entered an order forefeiting property owned by the Romans worth $1,162,016.

3. William Dredge and Further Events in Romano

William Dredge operated an antique store in north Miami, Florida. He was also a fence, a burglar, and a drug dealer. Mr. Dredge was a friend of Joseph Nesline, a Washington D.C. gambler, who apparently introduced Mr. Dredge to Mr. Borders in late March or early April of 1981. In March 1981, Mr. Dredge was the subject of a narcotics investigation in Maryland. He was in touch with Mr. Borders in connection with this problem.

Mr. Dredge testified before the Eleventh Circuit Investigating Committee that around the end of March or in early April 1981, Mr. Borders asked Mr. Dredge if he knew the Romano brothers since Mr. Dredge was from the south Florda area. When Mr. Dredge responded that he did not know them, Mr. Borders asked him to check them out. Mr. Dredge made some inquiries and reported to Mr. Borders that the Romanos were "good stand up people," which in underworld parlance meant they would live up to their commitments and not disclose matters to the authorities. Mr. Borders then asked Mr. Dredge to contact the Romanos and tell them Mr. Borders might be able to help them in their criminal case. Mr. Dredge passed word to the Romanos that he knew and attorney in Washington, D.C. who could help them with their case.

Hotel and telephone records establish that the Romanos were in California on April 7, 1981 and during their stay they learned through an intermediary of Mr. Dredge's message about a Washington Lawyer who could help them. In response, the Romanos contacted their counsel, Neal Sonnet, who documented the call in a memorandum dated April 16, 1981. The Romanos decided to ignore Mr. Dredge's offer.

Mr. Dredge reported to Mr. Borders about his attempted contact with the Romanos. Mr. Dredge testified before the Eleventh Circuit Investigating Committee that Mr. Borders said the judge handling the Romanos' case was a good friend of his and, for $150,000, he could deliver the judge. Mr. Dredge testified he did not really believe Mr. Borders could control a federal judge.

Over the next few months Mr. Borders repeatedly asked Mr. Dredge about the situation and Mr. Dredge reported that he had talked to the Romanos, but they did not have any money. According to Mr. Dredge, he was simply stringing Mr. Borders along. Mr. Dredge never had any contact with the Romanos or their intermediary after meeting with the intermediary in early April. Mr. Borders continued to importune Mr. Dredge about the Romanos and Mr. Dredge kept telling Mr. Borders that the Romanos did not have the money. According to Mr. Dredge, Mr. Borders said the judge could not believe the Romanos could not come up with money to keep them out of jail.

Mr. Dredge testified that when he suggested to Mr. Borders that the Romanos were trying to get to Judge Hastings through another contact, Mr. Borders challenged anyone else to produce the judge at a given time and place. Mr. Borders said he would produce Judge Hastings at a given time and place to prove he controlled him.

On April 29, 1981, a sealed indictment was returned in Baltimore, Maryland charging William Dredge with narcotics offenses. Mr. Dredge was arrested in Florida on May 10, 1981, and Mr. Borders arranged for Jesse McCarary, a Miami lawyer, to represent Mr. Dredge at his bail hearing on May 11, 1981. Also on May 11, 1981, the Romanos were scheduled to be sentenced by Judge Hastings.

Mr. Dredge testified before the Investigating Committee that he had a conversation with William Borders the day before the Romanos were supposed to be sentenced, in which Mr. Borders told him the sentencing would be continued by Judge Hastings in order to give the Romanos a chance to come up with the money, because the judge could not believe they would not do so.

At the May 11, 1981 sentencing hearing, the Romanos' attorney, Neal Sonnett, requested a continuance in order to present additional argument to the court regarding a pending motion for new trial that was scheduled to be heard that day. The Government opposed the continuance on the ground that everything had been thoroughly briefed and there had already been a delay of five months since the conviction. Judge Hastings granted the continuance and asked for briefs on RICO issues. He then set a briefing schedule and indicated that sentencing would not take place until late June 1981, but that the next time it was scheduled, sentencing would proceed.

Mr. Dredge testified before the Investigating Committee that Mr. Borders called him the day after the sentencing had been postponed to say that the hearing had been continued and the Romanos had better come up with the money. Mr. Dredge was convinced William Borders was serious about the bribe after the continuance of the hearing. It was Mr. Dredge's understanding, based on what Mr. Borders told him, that Judge Hastings had postponed the sentencing on his own motion. In fact, the May 11, 1981 sentencing was postponed on the basis of Mr. Sonnett's eleventh hour request. The fact that Mr. Borders knew in advance that the sentencing hearing would be continued, however, convinced Mr. Dredge that the bribery scheme was for real.

On Friday, June 19, 1981, a panel of the Fifth Circuit handed down a decision in United States v. Martino.[1] At issue in the case was an interpretation of the RICO statute's forfeiture provisions pertaining to the definition of an interest that was subject to forfeiture. The court held that the term "interest" did not include income, receipts or profits from racketeering activity. Government attorneys and defense counsel in Romano recognized that this opinion had important implications for the order previously entered by Judge Hastings on May 4, 1981, forfeiting property owned by the Romanos worth $1,160,000.[2] Accordingly, all parties briefed the issue in papers filed with the Court in advance of a hearing scheduled for July 8, 1981.

At the July 8, 1981 hearing, Judge Hastings was scheduled to sentence the Romanos and hear argument on all outstanding motions, including a motion for him to reconsider his May 4, 1981 order requiring forfeiture. At the hearing, after extensive argument concerning the impact of Martino, Judge Hastings stated to counsel he was familiar with Martino and had read the briefs. He had also received a memorandum on the issue from his law clerk shortly before going on the bench to conduct the hearing. At the conclusion of the argument, Judge Hastings reaffirmed his forfeiture order of May 4, 1981. He stated that he would file a brief written order explaining the basis for his decision.

Judge Hastings then sentenced each of the Romanos to a prison term of three years. The prison terms were consistent with the recommendation of the probation office.

4. The Undercover Investigation

On June 3, 1981, the case of United States v. Accardo was brought in the Southern District of Florida. This was a multi-defendant racketeering case in which Santo Trafficante, reputed to be the organized crime boss of southern Florida, was named as a defendant. The case was assigned to Judge Hastings. A month later, William Dredge flew to Washington, D.C. and stayed with Joseph Nesline from July 7-9, 1981. Mr. Dredge told the Investigating Committee that during his stay, Mr. Nesline had another guest at the apartment—Santo Trafficante. While at the apartment, Mr. Dredge observed Mr. Trafficante trying to contact Mr. Borders and heard bits and pieces of conversation which led him to believe that Mr. Borders and Judge Hastings were involved in a bribery scheme to obtain money from Mr. Trafficante.

Footnotes at end of article.

On July 20, 1981, Mr. Dredge advised the United States Attorney's Office in Miami that he had information concerning a bribery scheme involving Judge Hastings, Santo Trafficante and a Washington, D.C. lawyer who was coming to Miami the next day to meet with Mr. Trafficante. In return for this information, Mr. Dredge wanted the drug charges pending against him in Maryland dismissed. In the course of ensuing discussions with Government prosecutors, Mr. Dredge also revealed the proposal to solicit a bribe from the Romanos—the essence of which was that for $150,000 their sentences would be reduced to probation.

Mr. Dredge did not initially identify Mr. Borders as the Washington lawyer who was arriving the next day to meet with Mr. Trafficante. However, a strike force attorney who had worked in Washington recognized Mr. Border's name on a passenger list and visually identified Mr. Borders at the airport. The FBI followed Mr. Borders, who took a cab to Mr. Dredge's house and was later driven by Mr. Dredge to a shopping center. From there Borders took a cab to the Fontainebleau Hotel, where the FBI observed him meeting with Santo Trafficante for 5 to 10 minutes in a secluded area. Thereafter, Mr. Trafficante drove Mr. Borders to the airport.

Mr. Dredge continued to be debriefed by the Government concerning his knowledge of any bribery schemes. On August 18, 1981, Mr. Dredge told law enforcement agents that Mr. Borders was coming to Miami again to meet with Mr. Trafficante to iron out their bribery deal. FBI surveillance teams observed that on August 21, 1981, Mr. Borders flew to Miami, took a taxi to the Fontainebleau Hotel, got out of the cab, and got into a car driven by Mr. Trafficante, who drove him back to the airport. They spoke for four minutes at the terminal and Mr. Trafficante left.

Having twice corroborated Mr. Dredge's statements, the Government attempted to enlist Mr. Dredge's cooperation. Mr. Dredge refused to testify or wear a recording device because be feared for his life. He was willing, however, to introduce an undercover agent to Mr. Borders as one of the Romano brothers. Mr. Dredge advised the FBI that Mr. Borders was anxious to do the Romano deal, but that he would only deal with one or both of the Romanos.

On August 27, 1981, the Fifth Circuit handed down the case of United States v. Peacock,[3] which grudgingly followed the Martino rationale, while noting that a petition for rehearing en banc was pending in Martino. Jeffry Miller, one of Judge Hastings' law clerks, testified that he brought this case to Judge Hastings' attention in early September, in all likelihood before September 10, 1981. According to Mr. Miller, Judge Hastings then told him to "give the money back" to the Romanos.

On September 10, 1981, Mr. Dredge, in the presence of an FBI agent, telephoned Mr. Borders and advised him that the Romanos were "ready to deal." Arrangements were made for Mr. Dredge to meet Mr. Borders at the Miami airport on Saturday, September 12 at 8:00 a.m. and introduce him to "Frank Romano," who was to be impersonated by retired FBI agent, H. Paul Rico.

On Friday, September 11, 1981, Judge Hastings was scheduled to fly from Miami to Washington, D.C. Judge Hastings was scheduled to leave Miami at 3:48 p.m, but his flight was delayed. He called Mr. Borders' office twice to advise him of the delay. He did not arrive at Washington National Airport ["National"] until about 8:00 p.m., two hours after his original scheduled arrival time.

On the same day, Mr. Borders was scheduled to leave National for Miami at 7:30 p.m. in order to make his meeting at 8:00 a.m. the next morning with Mr. Dredge and "Frank Romano." However, he changed his flight to leave at 9:25 p.m., thereby arriving in Miami at 1:30 a.m. on September 12. This schedule change created a clear opportunity—at period of over an hour—when Judge Hastings and Mr. Borders could have met at National, althought no one actually observed such a meeting. Judge Hastings did not check into the Sheraton Hotel until 10:14 p.m., over two hours after he arrived in Washington, D.C.

The next morning, September 12, 1981, Mr. Borders met Mr. Dredge and the man who he thought was Frank Romano at the Miami airport. The undercover agent, Mr. Rico, was wearing a body recorder and recorded the conversation with Mr. Borders. At the meeting, Mr. Borders stated that he understood that the Romanos had "lost some property." He advised Mr. Rico that 10 days after receiving the payment of $150,000, an order would be signed returning a "substantial amount" of the property and thereafter, they were to withdraw their appeal and something would be done about their jail sentences. When Mr. Rico raised the issue of "how do I know," Mr. Borders responded, "checks and balances." Mr. Borders said, "I don't get nothin', until the first part is done . . . that will be a signal showing you that I'm, I know what I'm talking about, right?"

Mr. Borders proposed that the money be placed in escrow with Mr. Dredge and that Mr. Borders would only receive the money after the order came down. Mr. Rico said he preferred not to use Mr. Dredge and, aware that previously Mr. Borders had suggested to Mr. Dredge that Mr. Borders could provide his influence with Judge Hastings by having him show up at a given time and place, Mr. Rico proposed verification in that manner. Mr. Rico asked if Mr. Borders wanted to get back to him with the time and place. Mr. Borders said that was unnecessary and immediately selected Wednesday, September 16, 1981, as the date for Judge Hastings' appearance. Mr. Rico selected the main dining room in the Fontainebleau Hotel in Miami Beach at 8:00 p.m.

Mr. Borders and Mr. Rico agreed to meet the following Saturday, September 19, 1981, at the Miami airport at which time Mr. Rico would make an "up front" payment on the bribery deal. At the conclusion of their meeting Mr. Borders assured Mr. Rico, saying "that's 100 percent, 100 percent, 100 percent."

At the time of his conversation with Mr. Rico about the status of the Romano case, Mr. Borders had no official connection with the case. He was a Washington, D.C. lawyer, and was not a member of the Florida bar. According to Judge Hastings' trial testimony, he never spoke to Mr. Borders about the facts, proceedings, or issues in the case.

When Mr. Borders finished his meeting with the undercover agent, he flew from Miami to West Palm Beach and drove to a long-planned family reunion. He stayed there only briefly, however, and made a complex series of reservations and cancellations of airplane flights back to Washington, D.C. Ultimately, Mr. Borders flew from Orlando, Florida to Baltimore-Washington International Airport ["BWI"], arriving at 8:58 p.m.[4]

Judge Hastings was spending that weekend of September 11-13, 1981, in Washington, D.C. at the Sheraton Hotel. Jesse McCrary, a mutual friend of Judge Hastings and Mr. Borders, registered at the Sheraton Hotel on the 12th in the room next to Judge Hastings.

Around 9:00 p.m. on Saturday, September 12, 1981, Mr. Borders landed at BWI. From there he immediately went to the Sheraton Hotel in Washington, arriving at Judge Hastings' room at 10:00 p.m. When Mr. Borders arrived, Judge Hastings, Jesse McCrary and three women—two sisters, Pearl and Margaret Dabreau, and Donna Myrill—were in the judge's room. The group had not yet had dinner. According to Mr. McCrary, it was Judge Hastings' idea to delay dinner. Ms. Pearl Dabreau testified before the Investigating Committee that the group was "waiting for someone." Ms. Myrill testified before the investigating Committee that they were specifically waiting for Mr. Borders. After Mr. Borders arrived, they all went to dinner. At trial, Judge Hastings testified under oath that Mr. Borders' appearance at the Sheraton Hotel that night was a surprise and not prearranged.

There is no evidence in the record to explain how Mr. Borders knew Judge Hastings would be in his room at the Sheraton Hotel at 10:00 p.m. on a Saturday night, although Mr. Borders clearly went to great lengths to get there from Florida, including foregoing his family reunion.

On Tuesday, September 15, 1981, Mr. Borders and a friend, Madeline Petty, flew from Washington, D.C. to Las Vegas, Nevada to attend the Sugar Ray Leonard-Tommy Hearns championship fight scheduled for Wednesday, September 16. This trip had been planned as a birthday present for Ms. Petty; the plane tickets had been purchased two weeks earlier on September 1, 1981. According to Dudley Williams, a close friend and former law partner of Mr. Borders, Mr. Borders; friends knew that he never missed an important championship fight.

September 16, 1981 was also the date Mr. Borders and Mr. Rico had agreed that Judge Hastings would appear at the main dining room of the Fontainebleau Hotel at 8:00 p.m. in order to prove that the judge was in on the bribery scheme. FBI agents had the hotel under surveillance. Shortly before 8:00 p.m., Judge Hastings and a woman named Essie Thompson were observed entering the Fontainebleau Hotel and walking into the dining room.

Judge Hastings had invited Ms. Thompson to dinner the day before. He did not mention Mr. Borders to her nor did he indicate that they were meeting anyone. The maitre d' seated them at a table for four and removed two place settings. Judge Hastings did not protest. After about 15 minutes, Judge Hastings left the table and returned a few minutes later. At Judge Hastings' trial in January 1983, Ms. Thompson testified that when Judge Hastings returned to the table he said he was "looking for some friends from D.C." According to the FBI interview report dated October 10, 1981, however, Ms. Thompson told FBI agents that when Judge Hastings returned to the table he said he was "looking for someone, but did not see them." Judge Hastings acknowledged at trial that he did not have Mr. Borders paged. At trial, he testified that Mr. Borders had promised to meet him at the Fontainebleau that night but had not shown up.

Mr. Borders was in Las Vegas at the championship fight. He and Ms. Petty returned to Washington, D.C. two days later, on Friday, September 18, 1981, betwen 8:00 and 9:00 p.m. At the airport, Mr. Borders and Ms. Petty parted company. Mr. Borders took a 9:20 p.m. flight to Miami, in order to make his arranged meeting with Mr. Rico the next morning for the "up front" payment.

Mr. Rico had not told Mr. Borders that Judge Hastings had appeared at the Fontainebleau Hotel on September 16, as promised. Mr. Borders nevertheless proceeded directly from National to Miami for his rendezvous with Mr. Rico as if he knew that the signal confirming Judge Hastings' involvement had been given.

On Saturday morning, September 19, 1981, at 10:00 a.m., Mr. Borders and Mr. Rico again met at the Miami airport. Mr. Rico was wearing a body recorder. After an exchange about the Leonard-Hearns fight, the undercover agent said: "You did what you said you'd do." Mr. Borders acknowledged this and Mr. Rico continued. "Your man arrived and in fact, he arrived a little early and, ah, you said you could do that, and that's ah, your end of the situation." Mr. Borders then asked, "What is it in?" and Mr. Rico replied that it was just in an envelope. Mr. Rico said he would put it inside a newspaper and give it to Mr. Borders. The undercover agent then said "[B]efore we go any further, the last time we talked my understanding was that, ah, some property was going to be released." Mr. Borders said the property would be released within 10 days. He told Mr. Rico, "Once you do that then file a motion for mitigation of sentence." Mr. Borders said, "Just tell him [the attorney] you're tired of the appeal, just see if the man will reduce the sentence."

The two men then separated and Mr. Rico went to get $25,000 in cash which had been placed in a locker. The undercover agent returned and placed the newspaper containing the envelope with the money on the arm of a sofa. Mr. Borders picked up the newspaper. There was further conversation, and Mr. Borders told Mr. Rico that the money would cover a reduction in sentence for both Romanos. They then discussed when the balance of the bribe would be paid. Mr. Borders suggested it be paid as soon as the order was entered returning the forfeited money. Mr. Rico proposed another installment payment, then full payment "on the culmination," i.e., when the sentences were reduced. Mr. Borders objected that this was not the deal. He again proposed that the money be put in escrow with Mr. Dredge. Mr. Rico rejected that idea. They finally agreed that on October 3, 1981 after Judge Hastings issued the order, the remaining $125,000 would be paid.

There was no further contact between Mr. Borders and the undercover agent between September 19 and October 2, 1981. The order returning a portion of the forfeited property was not issued within 10 days of September 19 as Mr. Borders had promised.

On October 1, 1981, a lawfully authorized wiretap was placed on Mr. Borders' business phone, and on October 2, 1981, a similar tap was placed on his residential phone. Mr. Rico placed four calls on Friday, October 2, to Mr. Borders' office. Mr. Borders was out, but he arranged to have a call patched through to him. At 3:11 p.m. Mr. Rico spoke to Mr. Borders and told him nothing had happened regarding the order. Mr. Borders replied "I think it has . . . I'll check into it," and then suggested they cancel the scheduled October 3, 1981 meeting for the final payment. Mr. Borders said he was not sure he would be able to call Mr. Rico back Friday night; he explained he did not know if he could find out "because of the time." They agreed that Mr. Rico would call Mr. Borders at home two days later, Sunday, October 4, 1981.

By 4:50 that Friday afternoon, Mr. Borders was back in his office. In a call recorded by the FBI, Mr. Borders' secretary called Judge Hastings' chambers and was told that Judge Hastings had left for the day.

On Sunday morning, October 4, Mr. Rico called Mr. Borders as agreed to find out the status of the order. Mr. Borders explained "I have not, ah, gotten an answer, cause I haven't been able to talk to anybody." Judge Hastings testified at trial that William Borders called him the afternoon of October 4 and left a message for him to return the call.

On Monday morning, October 5, 1981, Judge Hastings told his law clerk, Jeffrey Miller, to do the order returning a substantial amount of the Romanos' property that day. This was an "unusual" request according to Mr. Miller, although he also observed it was unusual for an order to sit around that length of time. Another law clerk, Daniel Simons, stated that Judge Hastings seemed disturbed that Mr. Miller had not finished the order.

At 4:22 p.m. on October 5, 1981, Mr. Rico again called William Borders. He said he was anxious. Mr. Borders said he understood, that he had checked on the matter, that the order had not gone out yet, but "that's been taken care of," Mr. Borders said it probably went out that day, the 5th, or would go out first thing in the morning, on the 6th.

Less than one hour later, at 5:12 p.m., Judge Hastings called Mr. Borders and the following conversation occurred:

Mr. BORDERS: Yes, my brother.

Judge HASTINGS: Yeh, my man.

Mr. BORDERS: Um hum.

Judge HASTINGS: I've drafted all those, ah, ah, letters, ah, for Hemp . . .

Mr. BORDERS: Um hum.

Judge HASTINGS: . . . and everything's okay. The only thing I was concerned with was, did you hear if, ah, you hear from him after we talked?

Mr. BORDERS: Yea.

Judge HASTINGS: Oh. Okay.

Mr. BORDERS: Un huh.

Judge HASTINGS: Alright then.

Mr. BORDERS: See, I had, I talked to him and he, he wrote some things down for me.

Judge HASTINGS: I understand.

Mr. BORDERS: And then I was supposed to go back and get some more things.

Judge HASTINGS: Alright. I understand. Well then, there's no great big problem at all. I'll, I'll see to it that, ah, I communicate with him. I'll send the stuff off to Columbia in the morning.

Mr. BORDERS: Okay.

Judge HASTINGS: Okay.

Mr. BORDERS: Right.

Judge HASTINGS: Bye. bye.

Mr. BORDERS: Bye.

The Government argued at Judge Hastings' trial that this was a coded conversation intended to convey information converning the bribery scheme. Judge Hastings testified at trial that it was not a coded conversation, but rather a discussion about some letters he was drafting to help Hemphill Pride. The Subcommittee submitted the tape recording and the transcript of this conversation to a recognized expert in the field of linguistics, Professor Roger Shuy of Georgetown University, who analyzed the conversation and concluded that Judge Hastings and Mr. Borders were engaging in a coded conversation.

On October 6, Judge Hastings issued an order which vacated judgments against the Romanos for over $845,000 of the total original forfeiture of $1,200,000.[5] This order reversed in large measure Judge Hastings' prior order of May 4, 1981 and was inconsistent with his oral ruling on July 8, 1981. There had been no further filings or proceedings before Judge Hastings since the hearing on July 8, 1981.

Mr. Rico called Mr. Borders at mid-day on October 7 inquiring again about the status of the order. This time Mr. Borders said "it went out yesterday morning." This assertion corresponds to Mr. Borders' October 5 conversation with Judge Hastings in which the judge said he would send out "the letters in the morning." In fact, the order had gone out by special delivery the evening of October 6. Mr. Rico called Mr. Borders the night of the 7th to tell him he had received word that the order had been issued. They discussed arrangements for the final payoff. Mr. Rico offered to travel to Washington, D.C. on Thursday or Friday, October 8 or 9. Mr. Borders agreed and told Mr. Rico to call him when he got to town.

The National Bar Association had scheduled a testimonial dinner in honor of Mr. Borders, a past president of the organization, for October 9, 1981, in Washington, D.C. Judge Hastings was one of the sponsors of the dinner. On the morning of October 8, 1981, Mr. Borders received a call from Judge Hastings who stated that he would be arriving in Washington the next day at 10:40 a.m. Judge Hastings told Mr. Borders he was staying at the Washington Hilton, although he would prefer to be at the L'Enfant Plaza Hotel. Mr. Borders said he could always get Judge Hastings in there.

Mr. Borders picked up Judge Hastings at National on the morning of October 9. They drove from the airport to the L'Enfant Plaza where a suite and an adjoining room were assigned to them. They stopped briefly to see Hemphill Pride, who was also staying at the L'Enfant Plaza Hotel for the National Bar Association event. Judge Hastings and Mr. Borders then left the hotel and after a couple of intermediate stops arrived at Mr. Borders' office where Mr. Borders had a message to call "Frank" [Mr. Rico] at the Twin Bridges Marriott Hotel. Mr. Borders called and Mr. Rico told Mr. Borders he had "brought all the necessary papers." Mr. Rico and Mr. Borders agreed to meet at the Marrriot in about an hour.

When Mr. Borders arrived at the Marriott, he told Mr. Rico, who was wearing a recording device, to "get it" because he wanted to take a ride. Mr. Borders and the undercover agent got into Mr. Borders' car, with a bag containing $125,000 in 100 dollar bills on the floor between them. As they started to leave the parking lot, the FBI pulled them over and arrested Mr. borders.[6]

Mr. Borders was arrested just before 1:00 p.m. on October 9, 1981. At 1:18 p.m. Mr. Borders requested and received permission to telephone his attorney, John Shorter. Mr. Shorter arrived at the Marriott at 1:31 p.m. according to FBI logs. At 1:55 p.m., Special Agents Bird, Skiles and Murphy left for Mr. Borders's law office to locate and interview Judge Hastings. They entered the office at 2:40 p.m. and presented subpoenas for certain of Mr. Borders' records to Mr. Border's secretary, who was uncertain how to deal with the situation. She contacted Mr. Shorter and Agent Murphy explained to Mr. Shorter that they had subpoenas for records. Mr. Shorter told the secretary to accept the subpoenas.

In addition, Agent Murphy told Mr. Shorter that they were trying to locate Judge Hastings in order to interview him, and asked Mr. Shorter to give the judge Mr. Murphy's name, Mr. Bird's name and the number of the FBI Washington field office if he located the judge.

After leaving Mr. Borders' office and making a few stops, Judge Hastings returned to his room at the L'Enfant Plaza Hotel and ordered lunch from room service around 1:00 p.m. Shortly thereafter, Mr. Pride dropped by and joined him for lunch. Afterwards, they went downstairs for drinks in the hotel's cocktail lounge.

When Mr. Pride returned to his room, he immediately received a phone call from John Shorter who told him that Mr. Borders had been arrested on charges involving bribery that had taken place in Judge Hastings' court. Mr. Shorter also told Mr. Pride that the FBI was looking for Judge Hastings to interview him. Mr. Shorter gave Mr. Pride the names of two FBI agents and the FBI telephone number. He asked Mr. Pride to give the message to Judge Hastings and to tell him to contact the agents. Mr. Shorter thought that Judge Hastings should have a lawyer present and suggested the name of a Washington attorney. Mr. Pride immediately called Judge Hastings and told him he had an important message and that he should come to Mr. Pride's room.

Mr. Pride took his two-year old son and met Judge Hastings outside the elevator on Mr. Pride's floor of the hotel. Mr. Pride related Mr. Shorter's information. Mr. Pride testified at Mr. Borders' trail that Judge Hastings' reaction was one of shock, as if "he didn't know which way to move or what to do." Judge Hastings repeatedly asked where Mr. Borders was. Mr. Pride told the judge he knew nothing more than what he had learned from the phone call. The judge asked Mr. Shorter's number, but Mr. Pride stated that Mr. Shorter was with Mr. Borders.

Mr. Pride testified that he and Judge Hastings then left Mr. Pride's child at Mr. Pride's room and went together to Judge Hastings room. Mr. Pride testified at Judge Hastings' criminal trial that he suggested to Judge Hastings that if he had a problem he could best handle this matter in Florida, rather than in Washington and that he should get Florida counsel. Mr. Pride watched while Judge Hastings packed his clothes. When Mr. Pride offered to give Judge Hastings a ride to the airport, Judge Hastings declined, saying that Mr. Pride should not get involved because Mr. Pride was still on parole and that he would take a cab. They then went downstairs to the lobby where Judge Hastings and Mr. Pride parted. Mr. Pride testified that Judge Hastings made no phone calls in his presence.

At his trial, Judge Hastings testified that before leaving the L'Enfant Plaza Hotel, he gave Mr. Pride a 100 dollar bill and asked him to pay the room service charge and to pick up a suit Judge Hastings had left with the valet service. Mr. Pride, in his testimony, denied that Judge Hastings gave him any money or asked him to take care of the charges or the suit. The room service charge was not paid and the suit was left behind.

Judge Hastings also testified at trial that after speaking with Mr. Pride outside the elevators, he returned alone to his room and telephoned his mother and his fiancee, Patricia Williams, in Florida, while Mr. Pride went to his own room. According to Judge Hastings, when he called his mother long distance from his hotel room, she said she had learned about William Borders' arrest and that reporters were at her apartment complex. She allegedly was hysterical and told him to "come home." Judge Hastings also testified that he called Ms. Williams who told him that she had been interviewed by the FBI and that she had called his chambers and learned the FBI was interviewing his staff. According to Judge Hastings, Mr. Pride joined him after these calls.

The computer-generated record of all calls charged to rooms at the L'Enfant Plaza Hotel on October 9, 1981 does not reflect the calls Judge Hastings claims he made to his mother and Ms. Williams. The Chesapeake and Potomac Telephone Company routinely maintains a computer record of all telephone calls from the guest rooms at the L'Enfant Plaza Hotel. The computer runs for October 9 and 10, 1981, reflect only one call made from the hotel to area code 305—the area code for south Florida. That call was made at "22:00" (10:00 p.m.), long after Judge Hastings had left for Florida. Moreover, that call was placed from a room other than the one assigned to Judge Hastings. The records show no long distance calls made from Judge Hastings' room until the morning of October 10, 1981 at 1:56 a.m., again long after the judge had departed the hotel and the District of Columbia. That call was made to New York City.

On the afternoon of October 9, 1981, the FBI office in Washington, D.C. advised FBI personnel in Miami to begin interviews at Judge Hastings' chambers. The agents arrived at about 2:50 p.m. and were there until approximately 5:15 p.m. The Miami office of the FBI also received instructions to interview Ms. Williams, Judge Hastings' fiancee. FBI agents arrived at her office at about 2:50 p.m. and began the interview at approximately 3:00 p.m. Ms. Williams was interviewed by FBI agents for approximately 45 minutes. She was interrupted once by a phone call during the interview and stated to the agents upon her return that the call was from a client. On Friday, October 9, 1981, at 2:50 p.m. FBI agents left Mr. Borders' office to go to the L'Enfant Plaza Hotel. They arrived at about 3:10 p.m., and were advised by the front desk that Judge Hastings had not checked out. Special Agent Murphy then called Judge Hastings' room and there was no answer. The agent called several times over the next few minutes and then went to the room and knocked. Each time there was no answer. At 3:30 p.m., Special Agent Murphy again called Judge Hastings' room. There was no answer.

The evidence indicates that Judge Hastings departed for the airport within 30 to 40 minutes of the time he first learned of Mr. Border's arrest. By around 3:00 p.m., he was aware the FBI in Washington, D.C. wanted to interview him. Judge Hastings testified that he left the hotel at approximately 3:35 or 3:40 p.m. By 4:37 p.m., according to telephone records, he was at BWI calling his mother from a pay phone.

Airline records establish that Judge Hastings could have taken a direct flight that afternoon from Washington, D.C. to Miami, where his car was parked. There were 14 seats available on a flight, which left National at 4:35 p.m. However, instead of traveling to National which is located four miles from the L'Enfant Plaza Hotel, Judge Hastings went by taxi—at a cost of $50—to BWI, which is 32 miles northeast of the hotel and approximately an hour away in Friday afternoon traffic.

At 4:37 p.m., Judge Hastings called his mother from a pay phone at BWI and spoke for four minutes, charging the call to his home telephone. This is the first documented contact between the judge and his mother that day. At 5:06 p.m., he called Ms. Williams that day. He spoke to her for one minute and told her to call him back at a different pay phone. She called back at 5:07 from her home, and again at 5:22 p.m. from a pay phone. He then took her number, moved to a third pay phone and called her again. Judge Hastings admitted at his trial that he had engaged in this series of pay phone calls. He testified to several explanation for this conduct—a baby was crying; he suspect government surveillance near the pay phone; he was afraid Ms. Williams' phone had been tapped. He denied, however, that he went to BWI because he was trying to avoid any FBI agents who might be waiting for him at National.

Delta Airline records show that at 5:31 p.m. Judge Hastings made a reservation on flight 237 departing BWI at 6:30 p.m. for Miami with an intermediate stop in Fort Lauderdale. There is a handwritten notation on Judge Hastings' ticket crossing out Fort Lauderdale as his destination and substituting Miami. However, Judge Hastings got off the plane when it stopped in Fort Lauderdale. At the Fort Lauderdale airport, Judge Hastings rented a car because he had parked his car at the Miami airport when he left Florida.

Judge Hastings testified at trial that upon arrival in Fort Lauderdale, he went to his mother's house and then proceeded to the home of Ms. Williams. In his FBI interview on October 9, 1981, however, he stated that he called his mother from the airport and drove directly to the home of Ms. Williams, without first seeing his mother. Judge Hastings testified that he arrived at Ms. Williams' home between 9:30 and 10:00 p.m. and told her to expect a visit from FBI agents. At about midnight, two FBI agents showed up and interviewed Judge Hastings for two hours. They testified that they had gone to Ms. Williams' home on the chance that Judge Hastings might be there.

FBI Agent John Simmons testified that when Mrs. Hastings was interviewed by the FBI on the night of October 9, at about 11:00 or 11:30 p.m., she stated that she had not heard from her son. Judge Hastings testified at trial that he had gone home and that if his mother had told the FBI that she had not heard from him, it was because she had had too much to drink. Both Judge Hastings and his mother denied that she had been instructed to tell the FBI that she had not heard from him. Mrs. Hastings testified at trial that Judge Hastings came to the apartment and she gave the FBI Ms. Williams' telephone number when an agent called later that night.

When Judge Hastings was interviewed by the FBI at Ms. Williams' home, he denied any involvement with Mr. Borders in a bribery conspiracy. He stated that he did not believe he had ever discussed the Romano case with Mr. Borders. With respect to his abrupt departure from Washington, D.C., Judge Hastings said he went home because he believed he could better defend himself against allegations while on "his own turf." He later testified at trial that he departed immediately because of the telephone calls he made from the hotel to his mother and Ms. Williams. When interviewed by the FBI on October 9, 1981, Judge Hastings did not mention any telephone calls.

On Monday, October 12, 1981, three days after Mr. Borders' arrest, at 6:38 a.m., a person placed a telephone call from Judge Hastings' home telephone number (305-731-8176) to William Borders' home telephone number (202-398-6321). The call lasted two minutes. No recording of the conversation was made because the wiretap was no longer in effect.

On October 14, 1981, Ms. Williams wrote to Judge Hastings and told him that she felt "pride and joy as well as horror" as a result of their telephone conversation on Friday, October 9th, when Judge Hastings called her "from Baltimore" and indicated that he wanted her legal assistance in confronting allegations of bribery which Judge Hastings has just learned were being directed against him.

5. Contacts Between Judge Hastings and William Borders

As the Romano case proceeded, there was a series of telephone calls between Judge Hastings and Mr. Borders, which are documented through toll records. Judge Hastings also testified to two additional calls from Mr. Borders. While the content of these calls is not always known, there is a synchronization of contacts between Mr. Borders and Judge Hastings relative to significant documented events in the Romano case. As the Eleventh Circuit Investigating Committee observed, the telephone contacts between Judge Hastings and Mr. Borders were often of brief duration, sometimes at odd hours and on at least one occasion from and to a pay phone.

Analysis of these contacts reveals that most of the known calls occurred on or close to days on which (a) Judge Hastings had motions in the Romano case under active consideration, (b) Judge Hastings held hearings relating to the Romano's forfeiture or sentencing matters, or (c) William Borders was negotiating about the payment of a bribe. The available telephone records for Judge Hastings and Mr. Borders, and Mr. Borders' office message logs reflect only eight other telephone contacts from January through October 1981. Specifically:

1. On February 20, 1981, the day of the forfeiture hearing, Judge Hastings called Mr. Borders early in the morning. The call lasted three minutes.

2. On April 9, 1981, the day after the last memoranda relating to the forfeiture issue were filed, Judge Hastings called Mr. Borders' office. He left a message for Mr. Borders to call and said he would be "at his office between 12 and 1." At 12:15 p.m. a call was placed from a pay phone in the corridor of the third floor of the federal courthouse in Miami, Florida near Judge Hastings' chambers to a pay phone in the lobby of the federal courthouse in Washington, D.C. The call lasted one minute or less and was charged to Judge Hastings' residence. At about the same time, Mr. Borders' secretary made a reservation for Mr. Borders to fly to Miami the following weekend. This call was made within a day or two of them when the intermediary relayed Mr. Dredge's message to the Romanos that there was a Washington, D.C. lawyer who might be able to help them with their case.

3. Judge Hastings called William Borders three times within a few days of April 23, 1981, the date the parties were advised the Romanos sentencing was scheduled for May 11, 1981.

4. On May 4, 1981, the day Judge Hastings entered his ordered compelling forfeiture, he called Mr. Borders during a morning recess and left a message that he would be awaiting Mr. Borders' call between 12:00 and 1:00 p.m.

5. Judge Hastings called Mr. Borders four times between the call on May 4 and the scheduled time of sentencing on May 11, 1981 at 1:00 p.m.: once after midnight on May 6 from Madison, New Jersey; once on May 7 at 4:30 p.m. when Judge Hastings left a message for Mr. Borders to call him at 7:00 a.m. the next morning; and twice before 7:00 a.m. on May 11. Two of the calls (on May 7 and May 11) were to the home of Mr. Borders' girlfriend. On May 11, Judge Hastings postponed sentencing. One of the three documented calls lasted less than two minutes; the two others less than one minute each.

6. Judge Hastings sentenced the Romanos on July 8, 1981. On July 5, 7 and 9, Judge Hastings called Mr. Borders. The July 5 and 7 calls each lasted less than one minute. On July 9, Judge Hastings left a message for Mr. Borders. The following weekend Mr. Borders met Judge Hastings in Miami.

7. On September 10, 1981, the same day that Mr. Borders arranged a September 12 meeting with Mr. Rico, there were calls back and forth between Judge Hastings and Mr. Borders. The calls occurred both before and after the Borders-Rico meeting had been arranged.

8. On September 11, 1981, the day before Mr. Borders was to meet Mr. Rico, Judge Hastings called Mr. Borders twice.

9. On September 20 or 21, 1981, Mr. Borders called Judge Hastings which was during the 10 day period before the order was to issue.[7]

10. On October 2, 1981, after telling Mr. Rico that he would check on the promised order vacating the forfeiture order, Mr. Borders called Judge Hastings' chambers and asked to speak with Judge Hastings.

11. On October 4, 1981, Mr. Borders called Judge Hastings' residence and left a message for the judge to call.[8]

12. On October 5, 1981, Judge Hastings told his law clerk to get the Romano order out that day. At 5:12 p.m. that day, Judge Hastings called Mr. Borders.

13. On October 8, 1981, Judge Hastings called Mr. Borders and arranged to stay at the same hotel when he came to Washington, D.C. on October 9, 1981.[9]

6. Pre-Trial Proceedings

Following William Borders' arrest on October 9, 1981, a subpoena was served on the chambers of Judge Hastings, seeking appointment calendars, telephone logs, and other records. The requested documents were turned over to the FBI at the time of the service of the subpoena.

William Borders was released from jail on Saturday, October 10, 1981. The items subpoenaed from Mr. Borders' office on October 9, 1981, were turned over on October 13, 1981. At least two items from Mr. Borders' office were missing: a telephone message slip for September 9, 1981 and the secretary's desk calendar from September 1981.

On October 13, 1981, a grand jury began hearing evidence, a process it concluded on October 21, 1981. On December 29, 1981, an indictment was returned against Mr. Borders and Judge Hastings charging both with conspiracy and obstruction of justice.[10]

On January 4, 1982, the case was assigned to Judge Edward T. Gignoux, then Chief Judge of the United States District Court for the District of Maine, sitting by designation. He ordered reciprocal discovery, which called for each of the parties to produce for the other side those documents it intended to rely upon at trial. The prosecution produced its documents on January 19, 1982, including the tapes of the intercepted telephone calls between Judge Hastings and Mr. Borders. The defense produced its materials on February 12, 1982. Judge Hastings did not at that time produce any letters or drafts of letters about or to "Hemp" as referred to in the critical October 5, 1981 conversation.

On February 1, 1982 Judge Hastings filed suit to enjoin his prosecution on the ground that a sitting federal judge had to be impreached before a prosecution could proceed. Although this position was eventually rejected,[11] his criminal case was stayed pending the outcome of the litigation, thereby prompting Judge Gignoux to sever Judge Hastings' trial from that of Mr. Borders.

Mr. Borders was tried in Atlanta, Georgia from March 22 until March 29, 1982. Neither Mr. Borders nor Judge Hastings testified. The theory of Mr. Border's defense was that there was insufficient evidence of a conspiracy with Judge Hastings. Mr. Borders argued that although the evidence may have been compelling that he solicited and took a bribe on behalf of the judge, there was insufficient evidence that he had acted in concert with Judge Hastings.[12] The jury convicted Mr. Borders on all counts on March 30, 1982. Mr. Borders appealed, contesting the introduction of certain evidence supporting a finding that there was a conspiracy, specifically the evidence tending to show that Judge Hastings had fled Washington, D.C. after he had learned of Mr. Borders' arrest. The United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit concluded that the evidence of flight was sufficient to support a finding that Judge Hastings had conspired with William Borders and affirmed the conviction.[13]

Judge Hastings and his attorneys undertook to prepare his defense. In addition to having one of the defense attorneys attend Mr. Borders' trial as an observer, thereby enabling the judge to gain a preview of the Government's evidence against him, the defense team immediately reviewed the taped conversations.

On January 25, 1982, Hemphill Pride was interviewed by Judge Hastings in Columbia, South Carolina. Judge Hastings' principal attorney at that time, Joel Hirschhorn, was concerned about his client meeting alone with Mr. Pride and therefore arranged for a local attorney, Jack Swerling, to attend the session. When the conference concluded, however, Mr. Pride insisted on driving Judge Hastings to the airport. During that trip, Judge Hastings told Mr. Pride it was important for Mr. Pride to recall that the judge was trying to draft support letters for him. When Mr. Pride told the judge that he knew of no such attempts and, if he had, he would have stopped any such efforts, Judge Hastings replied that Mr. Pride would not have had to know about it. Mr. Pride refused to endorse Judge Hastings' suggestion and disavowed any connection with the letters.

Following the Court of Appeals' rejection of his challenge to the prosecution, Judge Hastings' case was set for trial. Approximately one month before trial, on December 13, 1982, Judge Hastings (now represented only by himself and Patricia Williams) for the first time disclosed to the prosecution the "Hemp letters," which consisted of three yellow legal pad sheets, comprising three handwritten letters, one addressed to Hemphill Pride, and the other two addressed generally to friends and supporters from whom Judge Hastings was requesting either financial assistance for Mr. Pride or letters of support to be sent to the South Carolina Supreme Court, to be used to assist Mr. Pride in gaining readmission to the South Carolina bar.

The prosecution submitted the letters to forensic experts in an attempt to date the creation of the letters. The Committee did so as well. None of the forensic experts, however, could date the papers. The paper and ink employed were such that it was impossible to conclude when the letters were written. Likewise, tests to reveal impressions on the paper other than the visible writing revealed nothing that could date the papers.

B. JUDGE HASTINGS' FALSE TESTIMONY AT TRIAL

Judge Hastings' criminal trial, conducted in Miami, Florida, began on January 19, 1983 and continued for 12 days. Judge Hastings took the stand as the final witness in his defense. During his testimony, Judge Hastings testified falsely in 14 different instances. Three instances of false statements pertain directly to Judge Hastings' testimony that he did not participate in a conspiracy with William Borders: (1) Judge Hastings' assertion that he and Mr. Borders did not agree to solicit a bribe from the Romanos; (2) Judge Hastings' assertion that he and Mr. Borders did not agree that Judge Hastings would modify the Romanos' sentences from a person term to probation in exchange for the bribe; and (3) Judge Hastings' assertion that he and Mr. Borders had never agreed that Judge Hastings would set aside the May 4, 1981 forfeiture order after a payment on the bribe.

The 11 other instances of false testimony pertain to Judge Hastings' attempt to explain away specific incriminating evidence. Judge Hastings knowingly testified that:

1. He expected to meet William Borders at the Fontainebleau hotel on September 16, 1981.

2. He was surprised by Mr. Borders' arrival at his room at the Sheraton Hotel on September 12, 1981.

3. On October 5, 1981, he told his law clerk to prepare the order in the Romano case primarily because the law clerk would be leaving his employment shortly.

4. His October 5, 1981 telephone conversation with William Borders was about writing letters for Hemphill Pride rather than about the conspiracy to solicit a bribe in the Romano case.

5. The "Hemp letters" were written on October 5, 1981, when, in fact, they were fabricated by Judge Hastings after that date in an effort to conceal his participation in the bribery scheme.

6. On May 5, 1981 he talked to Hemphill Pride by placing a telephone call to 803-758-8825 in Columbia, South Carolina.

7. On August 2, 1981 he talked to Hemphill Pride by placing a telephone call to 803-782-9387 in Columbia, South Carolina.

8. On September 2, 1981 he talked to Hemphill Pride by placing a telephone call to 803-758-8825 in Columbia, South Carolina.

9. The telephone number 803-777-7716 was the number at a place where Hemphill Pride could be contacted in July 1981.

10. On the afternoon of October 9, 1981, he called his mother and Patricia Williams from his room at the L'Enfant Plaza Hotel.

11. He took a plane from BWI rather than National because he did not think there were direct flights to Miami from National at that time.

[In the Senate of the United States Sitting as a Court of Impeachment]

In re Impeachment of Judge Alcee L. Hastings

RESPONSE TO MOTION TO DISMISS ARTICLE XVII

Article XVII charges Judge Hastings as follows:

Judge Hastings, who as a Federal judge is required to enforce and obey the Constitution and laws of the United States, to uphold the integrity of the judiciary, to avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety, and to perform the duties of his office impartially, did through—

(1) a corrupt relationship with William Borders of Washington, DC.;

(2) repeated false testimony under oath at Judge Hastings's criminal trial;

(3) fabrication of false documents which were submitted as evidence at his criminal trial; and

(4) improper disclosure of confidential information acquired by him as supervisory judge of a wiretap; undermine confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary and betray the trust of the people of the United States, thereby bringing disrepute on the Federal courts and the administration of justice by the Federal courts.

Respondent asserts that this Article should be dismissed for two reasons. First, he claims that the article is fatally flawed because it "fails to allege a separate 'high crime or misdemeanor' within the meaning of the Constitution." [1] Second, he claims that since sections (1) through (3) of the Article restate the accusations found in the first fifteen Articles, they should be stricken for the reasons set forth in his Motion to Dismiss with respect to those articles, leaving only section (4), which, he asserts, should be dismissed as redundant of Article XVI.[2] The response of the Managers to Respondent's second argument is set forth in Managers' Response to Motion to Dismiss Articles I through XV.

With respect to his first contention, Respondent's claims are both factually and legally inaccurate: his description of the substance of Article XVII ignores its important differences from the preceding articles, and his recitation of the Congressional precedents supporting this form of article is erroneous. More importantly, Respondent fails to understand, or even acknowledge, the import of articles of impeachment which do not merely set forth one or more impeachable offenses, but which assert that a course of behavior involving several forms of misconduct has damaged the body politic. Viewed in this context, it becomes apparent why such omnibus articles have been adopted and have formed the basis for all the impeachment convictions in the twentieth century.

In the American experience, a total of only five persons, all of them judges, have been impeached and convicted by the Congress. Three of those men (Judges Archbald (1912-1913), Ritter (1933-1936) and Claiborne (1986)) were tried and convicted on so-called "omnibus" articles of impeachment.[3]

Thus, in every impeachment trial in this century which resulted in conviction, the Senate has convicted on an article that included several acts of misconduct, including acts that were separately alleged in other articles.[4] Respondent's assertion that such precedents "have no real consequences" when the respondent is also found guilty on other articles misses the point, since a conviction on the "omnibus" article is a recognition by the Senate that such a formulation of charges is proper, and that the pattern of behavior alleged therein is a separate basis for removing the official from office.

In the impeachment of Judge Robert W. Archbald, the final article charged generally that as a district court judge, Archbald had used his office "wrongfully to obtain credit," and as commerce court judge, that he had used his office to affect "various and diverse contracts and agreements," in return for which he had received hidden interests in those contracts, agreements and properties. In the preceding articles, these charges had been specified and set forth separately.[5] The Senate found Archbald guilty of the charges in five of the thirteen articles, including the catch-all thirteenth.[6]

With respect to Judge Halsted Ritter, his acts of misconduct were pleaded in the final article of impeachment primarily by cross-reference to the preceding articles. Moreover, the cumulative effect of his conduct was specified:

". . . the reasonable and probable consequence of the actions or conduct of Halsted Ritter, hereunder specified or indicated in this article, since he became judge of said court, as an individual or as such judge, is to bring his court into scandal and disrepute, to the prejudice of said court and public confidence in the administration of justice therein, and to the prejudice of public respect for and confidence in the Federal judiciary, and to render him unfit to continue to serve as such judge." [7]

Objections similar to those raised in Judge Hastings' Motion to Dismiss were raised by Judge Ritter and rejected by the Senate. First, Ritter argued that the omnibus article should be stricken because the rules of both criminal and civil pleading were violated by combining separate and distinct offenses.[8] Second, Judge Ritter asserted that when the Senate voted on the omnibus article, it would have already voted on the previous articles, and

". . . it is contemplated that the votes of the Senate upon . . . all the preceding articles, shall be single, definite, and final, and that they shall not be presented again in a massed, cumulative, collective arrangement in the final article . . . Such an arrangement is decidedly unjust to the respondent. The single, separate, and final vote upon the preceding articles should end those articles, and they should not be voted upon again in the final catch-all arrangement of article VII.

"The object and purpose of such an arrangement can be but to cumulate adverse votes, if any, upon prior articles, with the hope that the cumulative or collective arrangement may be sufficient to sustain those articles in the vote upon the final article . . ."[9]

The Managers for the House of Representatives argued that neither criminal nor civil rules of pleading applied, and, more importantly, that the omnibus article was a separate charge in that it alleged a course of behavior more damaging than individual acts of misconduct. The article, it was argued, raised

". . . a substantial doubt as to [Judge Ritter's] judicial integrity . . . . We contend that this is the highest crime which a judge can commit on the bench. It is not whether he did this thing, that thing, or the other thing, but whether or not the sum total of the things he has done has made the people doubt his integrity as a judicial officer." (emphasis added)[10]

The Senate acquitted Judge Ritter on each of the first six articles, but found him guilty only of the omnibus article. A point of order was raised that the conviction was improper because of the acquittal on the substantive charges of the preceding articles. The point of order was overruled by the Chair, the Chair stating, "A point of order is made as to Article VII in which Respondent is charged with general misbehavior. It is a separate charge from any other charge."[11]

In the same sense, Article XVII herein is a charge separate and distinct from the preceding articles. Indeed, in the present proceeding, an even stronger case can be made that the omnibus article is a separate charge. Although it generally pertains to conduct that is also alleged in the preceding articles, Article XVII does not merely refer to those articles, but sets forth specific conduct which has undermined confidence in the Federal judiciary.

This recitation of conduct in Article XVII differs in several respects from that described in the previous articles. Section (1) would require only a finding of a corrupt relationship with William Borders, without necessarily making findings with respect to the details set forth in the preceding articles. Likewise, section (2) refers generally to "repeated false testimony." Section (3) relating to the charge that Respondent fabricated false documents is not set forth in the previous articles. Section (4), alleging improper disclosure of confidential information, describes impeachable conduct without the detail set forth in Article XVI.

The "omnibus" article further states that this conduct violated Respondent's responsibility as a Federal judge "to enforce and obey the Constitution and laws of the United States, to uphold the integrity of the judiciary, to avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety, and to perform the duties of his office impartially. . . ." This special duty and standard of Federal judges is at the heart of the omnibus article. In explaining the purpose of such an article in the Claiborne case, Manager Peter Rodino stated:

". . . The allegations of article IV rest on the same evidence adduced in support of articles I, II, and III. . . Conviction on article IV, however, rests on a separate and compelling legal theory, which has roots deeply embedded in the impeachment power. In 1936, the Senate convicted Judge Halsted L. Ritter of bringing disrepute upon the Federal judiciary that he had been chosen to represent.

* * * * *

"As Members of this body have recognized in prior judicial impeachments, the judges of our Federal courts occupy a unique position of trust and responsibility in our system of government: They are the only members of any branch who hold their office for life; they are purposely insulated from the immediate pressures and shifting currents of the body politic. But with this special prerogative of judicial independence comes the most exacting standard of public and private conduct."[12]

As in previous impeachments resulting in conviction, the final article in this case alleges general misconduct resulting in the undermining of the Federal judiciary. Although in the instant case, each act of misconduct individually constitutes reprehensible behavior totally at odds with continued service as a Federal judge, the gravamen of Article XVII is that the sum total of the individual acts is destructive to the judiciary. History attests to the fact that a pattern of misconduct is a separate basis for conviction and removal from office.

Accordingly, for the reasons set forth above, and in the Managers' Response to Respondent's Motion to Dismiss Articles I through XV, the Managers of the House of Representatives respectfully request that the Motion to Dismiss Article XVII be rejected.

Respectfully submitted, The U.S. House of Representatives.

[3] Neither of the other two convicted officials, Judge Pickering (1804) and Judge Humphreys (1862) was tried on an omnibus article.

[4] Respondent is mistaken when he asserts that Judge Archbald was acquitted. See Motion to Dismiss Article XVII, at 5: "The practice [of exhibiting a culminating article] had no real consequence in the Archbald and Claiborne impeachments; Archbald was acquitted in any event and Claiborne was convicted on other counts." In fact, both Judge Archbald and Judge Claiborne were convicted on a "culminating" article as well as other articles. [11] Ritter Proceedings, supra, at 637-38.

An analysis of the actual votes on the Ritter Articles of Impeachment does not support Respondent's claim here that a "culminating article," as he terms it, permitted an accumulation of guilty votes in that case. Respondent claims that Judge Ritter was convicted on the omnibus article because the "votes of those who thought him guilty of one or more were permitted to cumulate in the seventh. . . ." In fact, the vote to convict Judge Ritter on the final Article of Impeachment was only one vote greater than that on the first article, and a total of only three votes changed from the vote on the first article: one Senator who had voted not guilty on all the other articles voted to convict on this article, and two other Senators reversed their votes from the first article. Thus, there was no "cumulation" of guilty votes from other articles.

Likewise, the voting record in the Archbald and Claiborne impeachments shows no evidence of actual cumulation of guilty votes. Archbald and Claiborne Proceedings, supra.

Whatever the actual voting history in a particular impeachment, however, the fact remains that Article XVII in this case is not a mere repetition of the previous articles. Rather, conviction on the omnibus article reflects a determination that two-thirds of the Senate finds that Respondent's pattern of conduct constitutes "general misbehavior" which justifies removal from office.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to speak for up to 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I wish to deliver a few words in memory of Norris Cotton who served in this body for 20 years and who departed this life on February 24, at the age of 88 years.

Senator Cotton's funeral was held today in Lebanon, NH. I and my colleague, Senator RUDMAN, attended the church, and not surprisingly, it was filled to capacity, with all types of citizens from the most humble to the most famous, including former President Nixon, who entered Congress with Norris Cotton in the House of Representatives in 1946, and who counted Norris Cotton as one of his close friends and allies through all of the years.

Senator Cotton had already retired from this body when I first met him. In fact this Senator was mounting his very first campaign for the U.S. Senate when I went to see him in his office in Lebanon in the western part of our State. Before I called for an appointment, Senator Cotton had never heard of me; and never met me. Neither had nearly anyone else in New Hampshire. But he readily agreed to see me and was very courteous and generous with his time. He even insisted that I sit in the very chair which he had occupied on the floor of the U.S. Senate. As the Presiding Officer knows, under the rules, when a Senator leaves this august body he is permitted to take with him the chair which he occupied on the floor. And Senator Cotton had installed that chair in his office in Lebanon, NH.

When I went to visit him, he insisted that I sit in that chair and it was quite an inspiration and encouragement to this fellow named HUMPHREY who was undertaking what most thought to be an impossible quest.

But that it turns out was typical of Norris Cotton—courteous, kind, and totally unimpressed with himself, a most unprepossessing gentleman. And so, thanks to the kindness of Norris Cotton, who must have thought I had a snowball's chance in hell of winning election in my first try, I sat in one of these Senate chairs some 9 months or so before I was actually elected to this body. I liked the feel of it; it gave me encouragement.

As I came to know Norris over the years, I learned that such kindness and considerateness were his hallmarks. He was a man totally lacking in hauteur, totally unimpressed with his position and fame.

In the long history of the United States, few men have served with more distinction or accomplished more on behalf of the people of their State or their country, than did Norris Cotton.

The former Senator from New Hampshire, a man who for 20 years sat at the Daniel Webster desk, which this Senator now has the privilege to occupy, believed by many to be the greatest of all Senators.

I rise today to remember him, not merely because he was my predecessor in serving the people of the great State of New Hampshire, not merely for his accomplishments, but as an example of public service to which all can look for inspiration.

Norris Cotton served in the Senate from 1954 to 1974. But he began his public service career long before that, in fact before most of those now serving in this body were born. It was in 1922, before his 23d birthday, that Norris Cotton was elected to his first political office, as a State representative from Warren, NH.

A year later he became president of the Republican State convention, the youngest person ever to be so honored. During his first term he backed a bill that created the University of New Hampshire.

This interest in education was to be a lifelong focus of his considerable energies.

Norris Cotton came to Washington for the first time in 1925 as an aide to Senator George Moses.

At the same time he studied law at George Washington University, earning his law degree in 1928 which he put to use, moving back to Concord, NH, to practice law. He served two terms as the Grafton County attorney from 1933 to 1939, before being elected as judge of the Lebanon Municipal Court. In 1942, Norris Cotton won election to the State legislature again, 2 years later becoming speaker of the house.

During Cotton's tenure as speaker, the Old Man of the Mountain and "Live Free or Die" became the State's symbol and motto, and the legislature created the State retirement system.

It was in 1946 that Speaker Cotton returned to Washington as Congressman Cotton, elected by the people of his district to fill the seat vacated by Sherman Adams when he became Governor.

Norris Cotton served four terms in the House before winning a special election to fill the remaining term of the late Senator Charles W. Tobey. Senator Cotton went on to win three full terms finally retiring in 1974.

In the Senate his interests were many but his passions limited to a few vital issues. As the ranking minority member of the Commerce Committee, he played an important role in legislation dealing with aviation transportation, consumer protection, and telecommunications. As the ranking Republican on the Appropriations Committee he focused on labor, health, education, and welfare.

Norris Cotton's proudest achievement was in the field of health care. When he learned that New Hampshire and Vermont had one of the highest cancer rates he worked quickly to get the money to build a treatment center. "I thought we were having a lot of deaths because you didn't have centers available where they could catch cancers in time," he was quoted saying. He was able to get $3 million to build what became the Norris Cotton Cancer Center in Hanover at Dartmouth College.

He later called the construction of the center "the one thing I accomplished during my 30 years in Washington that gives me the most satisfaction." Of course, Senator Cotton did plenty more for the people of New Hampshire: For example, because of his tireless work on their behalf an air traffic control center was built in Nashua, and import quotas on home heating oil were lifted. He also played an essential role in the drafting of the 1970 Merchant Marine Act.

Senator Cotton had a delightful sense of humor, one which still remains legendary in Washington to this day. One of his many quips comes to mind: Long after he retired from the Senate he was quoted describing the parsimonious mood of his colleagues. "The boys," as he referred to his Senate colleagues, "are in such a mood that if someone introduced the 10 Commandments, they'd cut them down to 7."

After the many long speeches honoring him at his retirement, Senator Cotton rose to respond, with the humor so typical of him: "I remember in my youth it took me some 20 years to learn to make a speech, and then it took me about 40 years more to learn not to make a speech."

There are a lot of wonderful stories about Norris Cotton in the Senate even to this day.

He once left his hospital bed to vote on a tax reform amendment. Another time he left a State dinner at the White House and came to the Senate floor in his tuxedo to debate a water quality control bill.

Some of the best stories, however, are about the force of his presence on the floor during debates. Our former colleague, Charles Percy once said;

> When Norris Cotton spoke on the floor everyone listened, for if Norris Cotton felt impelled to speak, then he had something worth listening to.

One time he literally forced a Senator who opposed him off the floor with the power of his remarks.

Senator Cotton was an ardent fiscal conservative displaying the Yankee frugality for which our State is so famous. He frequently opposed new Federal spending as a solution for societal ills.

It was not that he was insensitive or uncaring about problems of our country, but that he knew that Federal intervention seldom can make a positive difference and frequently makes the problem worse.

As always, he did so in plain-talking language that made clear what he meant. In his 1978 memoirs, "In the Senate," he explained his conservative ideology in this way.

> The combined voices of all the politicians in Washington and elsewhere are as a mere whisper compared with the thunderous propaganda put out by the visionaries pointing the way to utopia by means of more Federal programs.
> The fallacy of their approach is the ingrained belief that any human ill can be cured by applying gobs of money, just as our grandmothers used to slap a mustard plaster on our chests for any symptom of whatever nature.

That was Norris Cotton, simple, direct, honest, and in most cases right.

Perhaps it was this political philosophy, his opposition to the ever-expanding Federal bureaucracy, that earned him a special place in the heart of one of the other great leaders of this body, and of this country, Senator Barry Goldwater. At the time of Senator Cotton's retirement in 1974, Senator Goldwater rose to honor him and acknowledged:

It was Norris who did more than any one Member of the Senate to induce me to run for the Presidency in 1964, and no one served that campaign with more ardor and devotion than he did.

So, for all that we have to be thankful to Norris Cotton for, we can also thankfully remember that it was Senator Cotton's influence that helped launch the conservative resurgence in America, and ultimately led to the candidacy and Presidency of Ronald Reagan.

It is for this reason and so many others that when I think of Norris Cotton that this maxim comes to mind: "A politician thinks of the next election; a statesman thinks of the next generation." Norris Cotton was a statesman.

I will miss him and I know a great many of my colleagues and all of the citizens of the State of New Hampshire will miss Norris Cotton.

Finally, Mr. President, I would close by taking note of the irony that today at the very hour his friends and colleagues gathered to honor him in a memorial service in a church in Lebanon, NH at that very hour the Senate and the House were gathering in joint meeting to commemorate the 200th anniversary of the first meeting of the Congress.

That is an interesting coincidence. It is an interesting coincidence that that event should take place during the funeral of Norris Cotton, one of the great giants of the Senate in this century.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

PROGRAM

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

AN ADDRESS BY BENJAMIN MEED

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, 2 weeks ago, Holocaust teachers, survivors, and members of the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Council met in Washington, DC, for the Second Annual National Alumni Conference and the National Executive Leadership Conference. Close to 300 people from 28 States were in attendence.

Benjamin Meed, president of the American Gathering/Federation of Jewish Holocaust Survivors, spoke at the National Leadership Board Meeting to Holocaust survivors on February 19. I wanted to share his remarks with my colleagues:

AN ADDRESS BY BENJAMIN MEED

We are together again and as always when survivors get together, there is a spark which ignites our responsibility to remember the past and our destiny—in the words of Elie Wiesel for the dead and the living we must bear witness. No matter from where in the nation we come, we have the feeling of familiarity, bonds that were fused by suffering and by a common memory. We know each other deeply and we also know how difficult it is for others, even our best friends who did not share our experience, to understand us or to enter into our inner soul.

I feel something rather special this afternoon for I see before me three different parts of my life, three ranges of activities that have consumed my time, my energy, my imagination, and my emotions for so many years and they have all come together in one weekend, in one occasion.

First and foremost, there are the survivors—you and me. We have traveled a long journey together, far from the world of our parents, far from the world in which we began our lives, the world in which values were shared and endured from one generation to another.

Instantly, that world was shattered and we were thrown into a world of darkness. We are the fortunate, we survived, just bodies and souls, no homes and no families. We were displaced people. Then we came to America. At first we were isolated; and then we were joined by others. It took time and hard work, but finally we survivors have assumed our rightful place in Jewish life and in American society. We have been together at commemorations and at Gatherings, at events large and small, all on behalf of Jewish life and our beloved State of Israel. We all love America. America did a lot for us. But America has not changed us, however. By our collective testimony we have helped to change America and especially American Jewry.

It is for survivors and for our collective legacy that the American Gathering was born and it is to survivors and to our legacy that I have devoted every ounce of my energy.

Our second major activity is now our teachers program of Holocaust and Resistance. As you heard from Vladka, who said it better that I ever could, the teachers are our connection to the future. They and others like them will carry part of our legacy to the American people, to an entire generation that was born after Auschwitz and Treblinka. You have seen them, our alumni, their devotion—and how much they want to learn from us the survivors. Here in America, these teachers recapture our memory and transmit it to the younger generation. You have seen their incredible quality as human beings and their enthusiasm to learn and to teach others.

In many European cities, every vestige of the Second World War and of Nazi tyranny has been erased. Cities have been rebuilt. The past has been covered over and the memory of Jews forgotten.

So let me thank Vladka. After all, she created the program and she has worked on it so tirelessly for the past five years.

Another most important activity of my life is the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, located in the heart of our nation's capital—the national memorial that will transmit our experience to future generations of Americans. It is a Museum, but not only a Museum. I am personally grateful that Chairman Harvey Meyerhoff pointed this out in his remarks yesterday. It is an educational institution that will include archives and an International Center for Holocaust Studies, a Learning Center and educational programs for an anticipated one million American visitors each year.

Imagine if someone had suggested in 1946, the year we came to the shores of America, that this would be possible—we would have taken him for mad. Imagine if someone had told you in 1976 that a national memorial would be built under government auspices on the National Mall in Washington, we would have taken him for a lunatic. Maybe we were meshugge—because while others told us to forget, we insisted on remembering and we will reap the fruits of our collective commitment. A national memorial will be built in our lifetime—within three years—and it will convey the Jewish and human tragedy in a manner authentic to history.

So my friends, this weekend we meet as one: survivors, teachers and Museum builders. For it is our common task that brings us together. We still must learn from one another. But above all, we must respect each other. We are interdependent—we need each other. Each one of these groups must appreciate what the other groups can give to our common task.

Yet at this hour, we survivors meet alone as we should, to take stock of the past and to ask some questions about the future. Where do we go as an organization? What is our task as survivors for the next several years? This question must concern us today. This should be our main agenda item.

Let us begin with an honest—and painful—assessment of our greatest enemy—time. Within a quarter of a century, there will be no survivors left to bear witness. Each day our numbers diminish and each year our energy wanes. So first and foremost our concern must be to finish what we alone can inspire others to complete because we are the eyewitnesses—because we were there in the pit of hell.

Not only in Washington, but also in New York, Los Angeles, Miami and other cities, they are building major memorials to the Holocaust. Survivors are involved with each of these important institutions as we should be. We have contributed to each of these institutions as we should and we have served as a conscience for each of them, demanding that they tell a truthful story, that it be told with dignity and in a manner equal to the magnitude of the event.

We have additional contributions to make—not only monetary, but material as well. Many of us have artifacts— uniforms, photographs and documents—that have been stored away in our homes. These artifacts will be of interest to our children, but they may have a greater power to instruct the generations, to provide a compelling and enduring documentation of our experience. It is time to clean out our attics and basements, to contribute the physical remains of our memory so that the story that will be told in the museums can reflect our experience.

I was disturbed last fall—as I am sure you were—to read in the press that two letters written by Anne Frank were sold in a public auction for $160,000. We now see that unless we take a stand, unless we protest, Holocaust artifacts will become a business and the material remains will be sold to the highest bidder. We cannot allow that to happen, and, frankly, if we permit this, then ultimately, it will be the enemy who profits—Nazis will sell their memorabilia, the Polish government will be sitting on a gold mine and the Czechs will make a fortune off the Precious Legacy. Only the moral voice of the survivor can put an end to this vulgarity.

Secondly, we must individually tell our stories, record our memories for posterity. In many communities there are oral history programs designed to record the experiences of survivors. They are being conducted in a sensitive and considerate manner. We greatly appreciate their work. Oh yes, survivor testimony must be given, gathered, and conserved, but it must be shared by all reputable institutions.

My fellow survivors, it is time to tell what can be told so that none of us will leave this earth without sharing our tragic and heroic story. I know it is painful and difficult—but it is so necessary. And these oral testimonies cannot be the property of any one institution. We must insist that they be shared among Washington, New York, Detroit, Los Angeles and others, so that all can learn.

Finally, for the past decade the American Gathering has been compiling a registry of Jewish Holocaust Survivors, the names and experiences and families of tens of thousands of survivors who came to the United States. We have the single most important archives on the survivors in the world. The American Gathering has the largest collection of information and data on the experiences of those who lived through the kingdom of night. The national registry can tell you the cities of their birth, the camps and time of their incarceration, the means of their survival, the places to which they moved after the war, the nature of their rebuilt lives in the United States and Canada, their children and their children's children. Historians have told me that there is no single source of immigration to the United States in the post-war years as authoritative or as complete as ours, but this too cannot remain ours alone.

We will have to consider a method of sharing this archive with the Holocaust institutions, libraries and resource centers throughout the United States—local and national—so that the focus and the discussion of the Holocaust will not be on the dead alone, but on those who survived and rebuilt their lives with dignity.

We must complete this registry in our lifetime. There are still thousands of survivors who are not recorded. There are an equal number of survivors who died in the United States before we established the registry and there are so many others whose stories we still do not know.

Our principle must be simple. Survivors have developed documentation as their contribution to history. What we developed must be shared equitably and openly with all those who want to learn about the Holocaust. Surely no commercial use may be made of this material and privacy must be guaranteed—but history must be served.

I am concerned—more deeply concerned than ever—with the themes of remembrance. For years, we fought against the idea that Jews went like sheep to the slaughter. Who, if not the Jewish survivor, taught the world of resistance and of spiritual dignity? Without our testimony no one would have known of the magnitude of the uprising in Warsaw, the revolt in Treblinka, the escape from Sobibor, the bombing of the crematoria in Auschwitz, the struggle of the partisans and underground workers, the inner life of the ghettos. No one would have known what it was like to be a Jew posing as a Christian, and sometimes even wearing a German uniform. Without our acts of witness, no one would have learned of the inner quality of defiance, of the thousands of acts large and small that characterized the spiritual resistance of our people.

Now as teachers are spreading the knowledge of the Holocaust and as museums and memorials are being built, we must again set the tone. Surely we must speak of death, but not of death alone.

We have all seen the skeletal remains of a once vital people, but we must give flesh to the bones and see the people as they once lived. Survivors have an obligation to convey that message and tell that story.

And we must be on guard against commercialization and vulgarization not only by our enemies but by our friends who mean well but do not understand.

Today everybody raises funds on the back of the survivor, everybody sheds tears for our experience, but in the process, they often cheapen the magnitude of the event and dilute it of all meaning. We must put an end to that.

We realize that the institutions that are to be created with our help will not be built for survivors—they are being built for all Americans, Jews and non-Jews alike. But only we survivors can make sure that the Holocaust will be presented truthfully. The world must know what happened and how it happened. It must also know who were the real Holocaust victims. And we must make certain that the exhibitions we help shape today will be permanent and enduring so that they can not be changed by any political whim or any change of mood.

And on a personal note, may I say that we have an obligation to those survivors who have entered old age without the material resources to sustain themselves in dignity in their final years. We shall hear of important plans to allow survivors to help one another so that those who are without families and without support know that we truly mean that we are our brothers' keepers. We must help each other.

To conclude, I would like to make a radical proposal—that we survivors, together with those who understand our goals, create a National Endowment for Holocaust Education and Remembrance, a collective fund that will provide adequate resources for work in the remembrance of the Holocaust long after we have passed.

In our lifetimes, we must support the museums and the memorial centers—but once we are gone, we must insure that our collective work for all these many years will be sustained. Ninety percent we may choose to leave to our families and to the charities, the tzedakahs, we currently support—but let us take what we are—a remnant—a remnant of our funds and pool them into a collective fund, the National Endowment, to be dedicated for all eternity to the causes we hold dear.

Let us go through these days together and let us share and listen. We will hear of the many wonderful activities throughout the nation. Proud stories of real achievements in Detroit and Miami, in Washington and in New York.

Let us use our days together to take measure of where we have been and think at great length of where we must go and what there is left for us to do together. Let us think and act.

Thank you!

A CORRECTION OF BROOKLYN'S POLITICAL HISTORY

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, it is important to correct the history of political events in the Central Brooklyn section of New York City. Current newspaper accounts have indicated that Mr. Wesley McDonald Holder, who has recently announced that he will serve as a Brooklyn coordinator for New York City Mayor Edward Koch's re-election campaign, has never lost an election. If the reporters who continue to perpetuate this myth would only check the facts they would discover that this claim is a blatant distortion of the recorded facts.

Mr. Mac Holder has clearly lost two elections. He was the campaign manager for New York State Senator Anna Jefferson who had won her seat on the Vander Beatty slate in 1982. She lost her bid for re-election to her Senate seat to Velmanette Montgomery. He was the campaign manager for then State Senator Vander Beatty who ran for a seat in the U.S. House of Representatives from the 12th Congressional District. He lost to State Senator MAJOR OWENS in 1982.

Mr. Mac Holder's alliance with Vander Beatty extended beyond his service as campaign manager in 1982. He also joined his protege, Mr. Beatty, in a court challenge that was later proven to be based on a criminal conspiracy involving the alteration of the records of the Board of Elections. Numerous citizens attending the trial watched in horror while Mr. Mac Holder conferred with Mr. Beatty in court and later cheered the court's unjust and corrupt decision to order a new election. This "contract" decision by a judge who deliberately delayed the trial in order to allow the minimum amount of time for the appeal was later overturned by New York State's highest court. Vander Beatty was ultimately convicted in 1983 by the State Supreme Court for election fraud, and sentenced in 1984 to serve 16 to 48 months in prison.

Commencing in 1982 with his alliance with Vander Beatty, Wesley McDonald Holder has insisted on throwing away what was once an honorable place in the political history of New York City.

Mr. Mac Holder is closely associated with Kings County Hospital in Brooklyn. He is thus in a position to clearly see one specific example of what the Koch policies and the sloppy administration of the hospital have done to the health care services of New York City. Being out of touch as a result of his age is not the explanation for Mr. Mac Holder's endorsement of Mayor Koch. The so-called sly fox of New York City politics has, for his own reasons, consciously chosen to disregard the suffering of the brothers and sisters all around him.

INTRODUCING CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE SUDAN

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to call the House's attention to the deadly conflict in the Sudan. Hundreds of thousands of people have already died in that unfortunate country; and many more lives are now at risk.

For 5 years, the Sudanese Government has been at war with the Sudanese People's Liberation Army, or SPLA. In the last 2 years, this war has brought famine down on the southern region of Sudan. According to the Select Committee on Hunger, 260,000 Sudanese men, women, and children died of hunger last year—and the count this year could be as high or even higher. Relief workers say the famine may be worse than the Ethiopian disaster of 1984–85.

As a Member of Congress concerned with foreign aid, I have been involved in this issue for some time. With many others, I have fully supported our assistance to the Sudan. But over the last 2 years, I have been alarmed by many reports of the Government's unwillingness to allow free passage of emergency relief to areas struck by famine.

Therefore, in December I met with Sudan's Ambassador. I informed him of the growing congressional concern, let him know that many of us cannot support aid to the Sudan unless its Government provides its starving citizens with food and shelter, and reminded him that inaction could endanger our friendship with the Sudanese Government.

As disturbing as the obstacles to relief has been the attitude of some members of the Government toward peace negotiations. Last November, officials of the Democratic Unionist Party, a partner in the Sudanese Government coalition, negotiated a peace agreement with the SPLA. Prime Minister al-Mahdi, reportedly influenced by Islamic fundamentalist parties, rejected the agreement.

This brought on a crisis within the Government. On Monday, February 21, Defense Minister Abdel-Maguid Khalil resigned to protest the lack of progress toward a political solution. Many senior army officers have joined his protest, and demanded a negotiated settlement. On February 24, al-Mahdi agreed in principle to such a settlement.

This sequence of events shows that many people in the Sudanese Government and in the SPLA have committed themselves to finding a peaceful solution—and that they continue to face opposition. Their concern is matched around the world. The United Nations, under Secretary General Perez de Cuellar, is undertaking a mediation effort similar to its work in the western Sahara. Senators EDWARD KENNEDY and ALAN SIMPSON have introduced Senate Concurrent Resolution 15. We in the House can add our voice to the many calling for an end to the starvation and violence that are killing people in the Sudan.

I, therefore, am introducing this concurrent resolution. By passing it, we join with many of our colleagues in the Senate, with Secretary of State Baker, and with hundreds around the world to call for a negotiated end to the conflict; and we give notice that "the character of the future relationship between the United States and the Sudanese Governments should be dependent on the Sudanese Government's willingness to allow humanitarian relief efforts to proceed unimpeded and on meaningful progress in peace negotiations."

Mr. Speaker, this is a tragic situation, and one in which our voices can make a difference. We all want the famine to end; but as Secretary of State James Baker said on February 8th, "starvation will almost certainly not end until the fighting ends." I hope all my colleagues will join me in working to bring peace and life to the Sudan.

LEGISLATION TO MAKE THE SECRETARY OF COMMERCE A MEMBER OF THE NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which would make the Secretary of Commerce a statutory member of the National Security Council.

In the world of the 1990's and beyond, a nation's economic strength—the health of key manufacturing sectors and the level of its technological development—will play an ever-increasing role in its political and military stature on the world stage. We need to begin giving greater priority to United States long-term industrial competitiveness and technological leadership, along with the defense and diplomatic concerns that have traditionally defined our national security interests. To compete in the high technology world economy of the 21st century, we must recognize that industrial strength is an essential component of our national security.

There are few who would dispute the fact that national security is determined by more than just military strength as measured in terms of defense manpower and weapons stockpiles. Yet much of our national security decisionmaking operates as if our industrial security and economic welfare were largely irrelevant to the political power and strength of our Nation.

Key economic questions are decided in the National Security Council on a regular basis, yet the individual most concerned with U.S. industrial leadership—the Secretary of Commerce—is not a member of that group. The Secretary of Commerce must have a loud voice in agreements involving the sale of key American firms to foreign interests, the export or licensing of vital military or industrial technology, and other decisions which impact our economy and are thus essential to our national security. He should not have to fight to see that his viewpoint is given thorough consideration.

This is more than just a matter of trade authorities being overruled for defense or diplomatic reasons. The Department of Defense has frequently expressed its concern over the health of the U.S. defense industrial base, and this concern extends increasingly beyond industrial sectors with an obvious military role. Because of this concern, the Department of Defense has sought to preserve and enlarge its role in economic decisionmaking. Unfortunately, there has been a general reluctance to recognize the importance of industrial competitiveness concerns over what may appear to be straightforward defense of diplomatic decisions. While the Defense Department clearly has a role to play in economic decisionmaking, allowing the Pentagon to have primary responsibility on commercial policy questions in the NSC is not the best way of developing commercial strategy.

The current debate over the wisdom of moving forward on an agreement to license American fighter aircraft technology to Japan for the development of a new Japanese fighter is a recent example of this phenomenon. Beyond my concern over this deal on its merits, I am troubled by the fact that American commerce and trade authorities were not involved in its negotiation or original approval. The fact that the Secretary of Commerce was able to persuade the administration to undertake an 11th hour review of the proposal does not allay my fears that we have inadequate procedures for assessing the economic repercussions which may ensue from this type of agreement.

It is interesting to note that the Japanese Ministry of International Trade and Industry was involved in every step of negotiations with the United States on this arrangement, and even the chief negotiator for the Japanese defense forces was a former high-ranking MITI official who had been a central participant in the United States-Japan semiconductor talks. In the future, our Defense Department officials engaged in similar discussions with our allies and trade partners should not be handicapped by lack of support from American commerce experts.

If we do not move quickly to support the areas in which we have a technological advantage, if we sell key technologies at cut-rate prices to our competitors, if we do not properly assess the impact of foreign acquisition of strategic industrial sectors, then we face not only the loss of national power, but the prospect of becoming a second-rate economic power as well. To deny the integral importance of commerce and competitiveness to our national security is to ignore the realities of international politics in the technological age.

Key decisions on export licensing, technology transfer, defense codevelopment projects, and other issues which directly effect our competitiveness and our economic well-being must be made with the input of the Secretary of Commerce.

MARIETTA'S KEEPER OF GARDENS FINDS ROMANCE IN FULL BLOOM

HON. GEORGE (BUDDY) DARDEN

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Speaker, Celestine Sibley, a popular Atlanta Journal-Constitution columnist, recently highlighted in her column the marriage of two of Marietta, GA's most distinguished citizens. Mr. Gene Tibbetts and Mrs. Virginia Berry were married last weekend in a ceremony at the First Baptist Church of Marietta. Mr. Tibbetts is largely responsible for the beauty of the Marietta Square. His gardening ability may only be surpassed by that of his new wife, Virginia.

I would like to submit for inclusion in the Congressional Record Ms. Sibley's column from the February 24, 1989, edition of the Atlanta Journal which features Mr. and Mrs. Tibbetts.

MARIETTA'S KEEPER OF GARDENS FINDS ROMANCE IN FULL BLOOM

[By Celestine Sibley]

It was a smart-alecky thing to say, but I couldn't resist remarking to Gene Tibbetts, 75 the celebrated Marietta gardener, that the weather was too bad for tilling the soil so, I heard, he was going to get married. Mr. Tibbetts laughed good-humoredly and put Saturday's ceremony in the First Baptist Church of Marietta in more positive perspective, having little if anything to do with the weather.

"Yes, we are getting married," he said happily. "I believe we can handle it all."

The retired insurance agent, who has planted and tended Marietta Square—both the park and the sidewalk planters—for 11 years out of a love of beauty, and 71-year-old Virginia Berry, who operates a jewelry store on the square, will walk down the aisle at 11 a.m. Their seven children and what Mr. Tibbetts calls "a lot of grands and greats" and scores of friends and admirers from all of Marietta, but particularly from around the town square, will be there to celebrate with them.

In fact, the wedding has almost become a community project, the bride laughingly explained. The couple are members at the First Baptist Church, where they met, so the congregation has what amounts to a proprietary interest in their nuptials. Mrs. Berry's Sunday school class is meeting tonight at a member's house to make sandwiches for the reception, which will be held in the church parlor. Other members, aided by Woody Tibbetts, Mr. Tibbetts's cousin and co-worker in gardening, are decorating the church with flowers and greenery. And the church's music staff will have trumpet, organ and piano playing the hymns for the ceremony.

After the wedding celebration, the bride and bridegroom will leave for another fete—the 97th birthday party of Mr. Tibbetts's first wife's father, Walter Hunt.

This party will be held in New Canaan Baptist Church in Paulding County, where Mr. Hunt was a farmer-sawmiller and active in county government. Five generations of his family will be there.

From that party, the Tibbetts will embark on a honeymoon, starting at Callaway Gardens and going on to New Orleans, coming home in time to prune the roses. Mr. Tibbetts mischievously suggested that he didn't plan to present his bride with flowers on their wedding day because he has already planted six rose bushes for her and she surpassed him in her care of them.

"She had roses from June almost till Christmas," he said. "She wants to move the bushes from her house to mine, where we're going to live, and that will give us about 20 bushes in all."

Mr. Tibbetts, who worked for Life of Georgia insurance company for 40 years, and his cousin, Woody, who was a postal service employee, were recently honored by the Men's Garden Club of Marietta for their contribution to the beauty of the old downtown area. The cousins, both widowers, grew up on adjoining farms in Dallas.

Mrs. Berry will wear a daffodil yellow silk dress—a surprise, she said, to her bridegroom, who thought she was planning a blue grown.

"Is she pretty?" I asked him.

"Yes," he said. "I think she's real nice looking, much nicer looking than the man she is marrying."

"I think the man I'm marrying is very handsome," Mrs. Berry said.

She also proved she could cook by "raising three big, healthy children."

The only one of their grandchildren who is not expected to attend their wedding is Mr. Tibbetts's grandson, John, who with his wife was graduated from West Point last year and is stationed in Germany.

Children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren have kept him from being lonely and sad since his first wife died five years ago, Mr. Tibbetts said. Both he and Mrs. Berry, whose first husband died nine years ago, found escape from loneliness in travel. And now they'll travel together—after the roses are pruned.

CAROLE BESWICK: "DISTINGUISHED CITIZEN OF THE YEAR"

HON. JERRY LEWIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to an outstanding women—Carole Beswick. On March 8, Carole will be honored by the Grayback District of the Boy Scouts of America as their "Distinguished Citizen of the Year."

Carole Beswick has been the mayor of Redlands, CA, since 1983. Normally, the position of mayor is considered a part-time job, but Carole has committed herself to this particular community in the 35th district, full time.

In addition to Carole's duties at city hall, her external involvement in community service is both impressive and far reaching. She is a member of the south coast air quality management district; chairman, advisory commission on water policy, San Bernardino Valley municipal water district; chairman, southern California earthquake preparedness project policy advisory board; member, San Bernardino County CSA110 District Advisory Commission, east valley corridor study; member, League of California Cities Public Safety Policy Committee; member, corporate body, United Church of Christ Board of Homeland Ministries; vice chairman, Redlands City Planning Commission, 1979–83; past vice president, member, Relations Inland Empire Cultural Foundation; past vice chairman, Project Heritage Auxiliary of Assistance League of Redlands; vice president, Redlands Area United Way, past campaign chairman, past member of allocations committee; Redlands Community Hospital, board of directors; Redlands Symphony Association; chairman, advisory committee, Town & Gown, University of Redlands; past vice president, Community/University Relations; Assistance League of Redlands, president 1979–81; Bonnes Meres Auxiliary of Children's Home Society, president 1977; Lawyers Wives of San Bernardino County, president, 1975; honorary member, Redlands noon soroptimist intervention project.

As you can see, there is no acceptable way to summarize the many important achievements Carole has made to the community of Redlands. It truly is her community in that she has contributed so much to its growth and development. I am proud to stand here today and honor her on the floor of the House of Representatives.

TRIBUTE TO THE CENTRAL CHRISTIAN CHURCH OF BATTLE CREEK

HON. HOWARD WOLPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I want to pay special tribute to Central Christian Church of Battle Creek, MI, on the occasion of the dedication of its new church building.

In 1902, a group of Christians came together in Battle Creek to organize an independent Christian Church. The group soon merged with the members of the Grace Temple, and called their first minister, Reverend Buzzell. The ordinal group of 40 members grew steadily, and soon outgrew the Grace Temple facility. In 1922, the church moved to the Kingman home at the corner of Main Street and Lathrop. The home was extensively remodeled and several additions were built. Surviving a fire in 1933, the church continued to grow. Two wings had to be added onto the sanctuary in the late 1960's; their addition nearly doubled the facility's size.

By the early 1980's, it became clear that the old building could no longer accommodate the still expanding congregation. The decision was made to relocate, to acquire new land, and to construct a spacious new facility on Riverside Drive. I was privileged to participate in the dedication of the beautiful new building on December 11, 1988.

Mr. Speaker, the members of the Central Christian Church take understandable pride in their history and the strength of their faith. Their dedication symbolizes a confidence and understanding in both Central Christian's past and future.

CONDEMNING DEATH THREATS AGAINST SALMAN RUSHDIE

HON. GEORGE MILLER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, today on behalf of myself and my colleague from New York, Mr. SOLARZ, I am introducing a House resolution condemning the death threats against British author Salman Rushdie and those associated with his book, "The Satanic Verses," issued by Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini of Iran.

The House resolution is broader than the earlier joint resolution I introduced on February 23, expressing the commitment of the House to protect the right of anyone to read, write, publish, sell, and distribute books, as well expressing our support for actions taken by the European Community member states. The House resolution declares that the death threats issued against Mr. Rushdie and those associated with him are an unacceptable attack on one of our most basic and sacred principles, freedom of expression.

I hope that the 110 Members of the House who cosponsored the joint resolution, as well as the rest of the House will join Mr. SOLARZ and myself in swiftly placing the House firmly on record in opposition to this attack on freedom of expression.

The text of the resolution follows:

H. RES. —

Whereas Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini of Iran issued death threats against Salman Rushdie, author of the novel Satanic Verses, and other persons associated with the publication and distribution of the book;

Whereas one of the most sacred principles of the United States is the fundamental right to freedom of expression;

Whereas the death threats issued by Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini represent a pernicious and unacceptable threat to freedom of expression and to the freedom of writers and publishers in every country;

Whereas the Ayatollah's death threats are an invitation to murder and an openly hostile act in flagrant violation of internationally accepted rules of behavior and contrary to the Charter of the United Nations; and

Whereas the Ayatollah's death threats against Salman Rushdie and others associated with his book jeopardize efforts to improve relations between the United States and Iran: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives—

(1) condemns the death threats issued by Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini against Salman Rushdie and others associated with the publication and distribution of his book Satanic Verses;

(2) condemns as incitement to terrorism by a state the threat of the Islamic Republic of Iran and the Ayatollah Khomeini to assassinate citizens of other countries on foreign soil;

(3) calls for the repudiation of such threats and the immediate withdrawal of any monetary reward or martyrdom for the murder of Salman Rushdie;

(4) commends the European Community member states for their statement condemning the threats and their united action in withdrawing their senior diplomats from Iran;

(5) commends all those authors, publishers, and other persons who have reaffirmed the fundamental right to freedom of expression by courageously resisting threats and intimidation;

(6) applauds President George Bush for his strongly worded statement of outrage against the Iranian Government's actions and calls upon the President to continue to condemn publicly any and all threats made against the author and other persons associated with the book Satanic Verses;

(7) declares the commitment of the United States Government to the protection of the right of any person to write, publish, sell, buy, and read books without fear of intimidation and violence; and

(8) asks that the President direct Federal agencies to cooperate fully with State and local law enforcement authorities to provide protection against threats for commercial establishments, including bookstores, that may wish to display and distribute Mr. Rushdie's novel.

MANDATING HOSPICE COVERAGE UNDER THE MEDICAID PROGRAM

HON. LEON E. PANETTA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to reintroduce legislation to make hospice coverage under the Medicaid Program, which is now optional, a mandatory benefit. As you may know, hospice was made an option under Medicaid in legislation passed and enacted during the 99th Congress at the same time that the hospice Medicare benefit was made permanent. I was proud to be the sponsor of both these pieces of legislation to serve the terminally ill and their families, and am pleased to introduce this bill today to extend the Medicaid hospice benefit. This measure, which was first introduced last March, had 39 cosponsors in the last Congress.

In reintroducing this measure, I am very pleased to be joined by my distinguished colleagues, Mr. WAXMAN, chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee's Subcommittee on Health and the Environment, Mr. MADIGAN, ranking minority member of that subcommittee, Mr. GRADISON, ranking minority member of the Ways and Means Committee's Health Subcommittee, and total of 15 other cosponsors. I would like to note that Mr. WAXMAN and Mr. GRADISON were also original cosponsors of the optional Medicaid hospice measure, and their continuing support in this effort, as well as with hospice legislation in general, is greatly appreciated.

As you know, hospice is a compassionate, cost-effective system of caring for the terminally ill that helps them remain in their homes and communities, among family and friends. Over the past decade, we have seen enormous growth in the hospice movement, with approximately 150 new ones having been created every year for the past 3 years. Today, there are over 1,700 hospice programs in operation throughout the country, of which 1,450 are full-service programs. Of these, half are already certified by Medicare, and 200 are in the process of becoming certified.

Hospice provides an innovative means of care and support in which a team of health care workers and others strive to make the remainder of the lives of the terminally ill, and the lives of their families during this very difficult time, to be as meaningful and comfortable as possible. Serious illness is difficult at any time, and terminal illness is much more so: physically, emotionally, spiritually, and economically. Hospice helps to significantly relieve the burden in all of these areas.

Not only is hospice compassionate and emotionally supportive for the terminally ill and their families; as important, in this time when the need for cost containment is crucial, it is highly cost-effective as well. It is widely concluded that the substitution of hospice for acute care can save significant amounts of money. The Congressional Budget Office has estimated that hospice coverage under Medicare could save more than $100 million over 3 years. As for Medicaid, Illinois, for example, would save at least $1 million per year, by a conservative estimate, if it had such a benefit, based on decreasing Medicaid costs by at least 27 percent through less use of inpatient care. The State of California has estimated that a Medicaid hospice benefit would save over $2.1 million per year, with over $1 million of that being Federal savings, once fully implemented. Additional evidence of hospice's cost-effectiveness is provided by several studies that have shown hospice care saving 20 to 40 percent when compared with traditional acute care, and by the fact that numerous major health insurers have included a hospice benefit with little or no increase in premiums. We must continue to encourage the development and utilization of cost-effective, community-based forms of care such as hospice as we struggle to reduce the deficit.

Mr. Speaker, when the legislation making hospice an option under Medicaid was first introduced, it was with the aim of making this form of care for the terminally ill available to those with low incomes and their families. While the Medicare benefit makes hospice available to the elderly and disabled, and these groups comprise a large proportion of those who could benefit from hospice, a need was seen to enable Medicaid beneficiaries, who are low-income, disabled, or both, to have access to the same services.

The ranks of these persons now include, unfortunately, a large number of AIDS patients, and will include many more over time. As you know, AIDS is the greatest epidemic and the worst public health problem to strike this country in this century, and possibly in our entire history. As of February 6, 1989, there was a total of 85,590 reported AIDS cases and 48,957 deaths as a result of the disease. Projections by the Public Health Service and the Centers for Disease Control show a cumulative total of at least 270,000 AIDS cases in the United States and 180,000 deaths, with over 50,000 of these occurring in 1991 alone.

Clearly, much needs to be done to care for the rapidly growing number of persons who are going to become terminally ill and die of AIDS, and to do this in the most cost-effective and compassionate manner possible. Hospice, with its combination of in-patient and out-patient care, provides the most appropriate means of care for many who are dying of AIDS. In fact, hospices saw 25 percent of all persons who died of AIDS last year.

In particular, there is a large and rapidly-growing group of intravenous drug abusers among AIDS patients, and these persons often are homeless or have unstable living situations and cannot be adequately cared for at home without outside assistance. For these persons in particular, as well as many other AIDS patients, hospice probably provides the best possible care during the terminal stages of the disease. Fiscal year 1988 budget reconciliation legislation includes a provision that will reimburse hospices for inpatient care for Medicaid patients with AIDS even if these patients must spend more than 20 percent of their time in such a setting. This, in combination with the expansion of the hospice Medicaid benefit provided by this bill, should enable many more AIDS patients to receive the care they need in hospice programs, rather than having to spend all of their time in expensive inpatient settings or, worse, end up in the streets or bad home situations.

In addition, even with the greater need of AIDS hospice patients for inpatient care, hospice can save considerable sums when compared with traditional forms of care. In San Francisco, which makes extensive use of hospice and other community-based care, it costs about $25,000 to care for AIDS patients during their last year of life. In Atlanta, it would cost approximately $66,000 and in New York City, $120,000. Neither of these cities has extensive hospice programs.

So far, 13 States, including New York, Michigan, Florida, Illinois, Texas, and North Carolina, have created a Medicaid hospice benefit since the enactment of the option. While several other states are also moving to create such a benefit, and this is encouraging, the other cosponsors and I believe that the current need is great enough to warrant making the hospice Medicaid benefit mandatory. This would rapidly speed up the process by which hospice services will become accessible to Medicaid beneficiaries throughout the country. The bill would become effective for calendar quarters beginning on or after January 1, 1990. States would be allowed additional time to enact enabling legislation if necessary, as will obviously be true in many cases. We urge our colleagues to give their approval of this measure to expand hospice coverage for those who could most benefit by it, and to save taxpayer and government funds in the process.

For your convenience, the text of the bill follows:

H.R. 1259

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. MANDATING HOSPICE COVERAGE UNDER THE MEDICAID PROGRAM

(a) IN GENERAL.—Subparagraphs (A) and (C)(iv) of section 1902(a)(10) of the Social Security Act (42 U.S.C. 1396a(a)(10)) are each amended by inserting "and (18)" after "(17)".

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE.—(1) The amendments made by subsection (a) apply (except as provided under paragraph (2)) to payments under title XIX of the Social Security Act for calendar quarters beginning on or after January 1, 1990, without regard to whether or not final regulations to carry out such amendments have been promulgated by such date.

(2) In the case of a State plan for medical assistance under title XIX of the Social Security Act which the Secretary of Health and Human Services determines requires State legislation (other than legislation appropriating funds) in order for the plan to meet the additional requirements imposed by the amendments made by subsection (a), the State plan shall not be regarded as failing to comply with the requirements of such title solely on the basis of its failure to meet these additional requirements before the first day of the first calendar quarter beginning after the close of the first regular session of the State legislature that begins after the date of the enactment of this Act. For purposes of the previous sentence, in the case of a State that has a 2-year legislative session, each year of such session shall be deemed to be a separate regular session of the State legislature.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION EXTENDING QUALIFIED MORTGAGE BOND PROGRAM

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, I introduced legislation to extend the qualified mortgage bond program for 3 years, through the end of 1992. My bill, H.R. 1200, was cosponsored by 16 members of the Committee on Ways and Means, and is identical to legislation introduced in the other body by Senator RIEGLE.

Mr. Speaker, the mortgage bond program is an unqualified success story. Its purpose is straightforward: to help individuals and families achieve the American dream of owning their own home. Since 1980, the program has, nationwide, provided low-interest loans to over 750,000 individuals purchasing their first home. At a time when housing prices are skyrocketing and interest rates are beginning to increase, the importance of this program cannot be overstated.

In my own State of Massachusetts, the Massachusetts Housing Finance Agency [MHFA] administers the Qualified Mortgage Bond [QMB] Program. The Massachusetts agency is among the best housing finance agencies in the Nation, and has developed guidelines that truly target the benefits of the program to those who most need it. The program helps lower middle income individuals who would have otherwise absolutely been unable to purchase a home do so. In Massachusetts, where the State median income is $41,000, the median income of assisted homebuyers is $31,000. In an area where a modest home can cost over $200,000, it's easy to see how this program has helped Massachusetts.

The mechanics of the program are actually quite simple. A State will issue bonds, the interest on which is tax-exempt under authority of section 103 of the Internal Revenue Code, and pledge the bond proceeds for first-time mortgage loans. Then, assuming that the potential borrower meets the requirements contained in section 143 of the Internal Revenue Code—as well as whatever requirements may be imposed under State law—a home mortgage can be made. Unlike many of the other tax-exempt bond provisions contained in the code, the benefits of this program go to low and middle income Americans—not to bond lawyers and underwriters. Authority for States to issue tax-exempt bonds for qualified mortgage expires at the end of 1989.

Last year, as part of the Technical and Miscellaneous Revenue Act [TAMRA], Congress extended the QMB Program for 1 year, with broad, bipartisan support. Over 350 Members of the House had cosponsored my legislation to extend the program—if not an all-time record in the House of Representatives, then close to it. TAMRA also further targeted the program.

Under code section 143, a bond is not a tax-exempt QMB unless it meets several restrictions. First, the purchase price of a house purchased with a loan from a QMB cannot exceed 90 percent of the average area purchase price. Second, the income of borrowers generally cannot exceed 115 percent of the area median income—100 percent of area median income in the case of single purchasers of two individuals. The 115 or 100 percent level if adjusted upward—but not down—in areas of the country with high housing prices in relation to income. Finally, loans from QMB's must be made within 3 years from the date when the bond is issued, and loan repayments must generally—but not always—be used to redeem the bonds.

TAMRA also included a new recapture provision, designed to insure that individuals who have rapidly increasing incomes and who use the program to build up equity in a QMB-financed house as a down payment on a more expensive house will not take advantage of the QMB Program. Under the recapture provisions, individuals who sell a QMB-financed house within 10 years of its purchase would generally be required to recapture a portion of the subsidy provided by using QMB financing. Recapture is not a condition of bond exemption; rather, it is a requirement imposed on home buyers. Because of some questions over the efficacy of the recapture provisions, the conferees on TAMRA agreed to delay the effective date of the provision, generally to loans originated after December 31, 1990.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I supported the recapture provisions—but I am pleased with the 2-year delay. It seems to me that some questions over the operational rules of the recapture provisions need to be answered before they go into effect. For example, is 10 years too lengthy a period during which recapture could be imposed? Second, should the Federal recapture rules preempt State or local law which may impose similar or stricter requirements? Third, should there be exemption from recapture in certain sympathetic circumstances? The General Accounting Office was directed, in TEMRA, to answer these questions, and I am confident that they will do so. It is my understanding that GAO is meeting with industry groups on this study, and I encourage this continued dialog. But let me say in conclusion that I support some rules which will insure that this program benefits only those who need it—and if recapture is the only way to do so, then I will not support another delay in the effective date of recapture.

Mr. Speaker, I urge all Members of the House to cosponsor H.R. 1200. The legislation extends a program that helps thousands of Americans take a continued step on the road toward realizing the American dream.

THE AFRICAN-AMERICAN CHURCH, BROOKLYN AND NATIONALLY

HON. MAJOR R. OWENS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. OWENS of New York. Mr. Speaker, this Black History Month the Congressional Black Caucus through a special order paid tribute to the role of African-American churches in economic, political, and social development at home and abroad. I would like to add my remarks to its special recognition of an institution which has been a mainstay of the African-American community.

Religion has been the most important cultural aspect in the life of African-Americans. African worship began in the seat of civilization in Africa. In the United States, africanisms survived in African-American worship, despite the slave system's efforts to strip African slaves of their languages, ethnic cultures, customs, names, and religious beliefs, in order to more completely subjugate them.

Free African-Americans in the Northern States were sometimes permitted to worship in white churches, but they were relegated to segregated "Negro" pews. Disgusted by this segregation, African-Americans began to form their own churches. The establishment of early African-American religious institutions in my congressional district of Brooklyn followed this pattern. By 1900 there were 18 African-American churches in Brooklyn.

These churches, like those elsewhere in the Nation, evolved into primary agents for social and economic progress in the African-American community, and a respite from the racial oppression and discrimination African-Americans faced. In the latter half of the 19th century in Brooklyn, many secular activities had their beginnings or their base in churches. For instance, historic Bridge Street A.M.E.W. Church was a terminal in the famous underground railroad, which aided fugitive African slaves fleeing the South for freedom in the northern United States and Canada.

By the 1890's African-American churches in Brooklyn began to provide various community education services. This was due to the emergency of African-American middleclass and affluent church members. Most of Brooklyn's African-American literary societies began in the churches. By 1890 almost every major African-American church in the area had its own literary circle or society. The most well known were the Concord Literary Circle and the Brooklyn Literary Union of Siloam Presbyterian Church. As more African-Americans from the South migrated to northern areas, Brooklyn's African-American churches sponsored numerous education programs, Sunday schools, missionary societies, Christian associations, mutual aid and social welfare organizations to meet the needs of the new arrivals.

African-American ministers consequently became the spokesperson for the desires and aspirations of their people. Among the noted activist African-American ministers in Brooklyn were Amos N. Freeman of Siloam Presbyterian Church. During his double pastorate from 1852 to 1850 and from 1864 to 1885, he was the president of the African Civilization Society and led the fight against school segregation. Another outstanding African-American minister of Brooklyn was Baptist Thomas S. Harten of Holy Trinity Church. Harten led protest marches, was the founder and president of the Afro-Protective League, commanded personal audiences with several U.S. Presidents, led the campaign for the defense of the Scottsboro Boys, a group of African-American men in the South who were falsely accused of assaulting a white woman, and was the organizer of a Roosevelt for President Party in New York. Harten was also nominated to run for the New York City Council and the U.S. Congress.

One of the most controversial Brooklyn-based ministers was George Frazier Miller of St. Augustine's Protestant Episcopal Church. He was a contributing editor to the leftist magazine, "The Messenger."

His religious philosophy was to deal with both the theological salvation of humankind and "the whole man while he is yet on this side of the grave." He was the minister of St. Augustine's from 1896 through the 1920's.

Over the years, churches in the U.S., both white and African-American, have experienced a massive decrease in memberships. Apparently this decrease coincides with the rise of an intellectual middle class among the younger generations of both ethnic groups which rejects traditional religious dogma. African-American church leaders can stem the decline of African-American church members if they examine how their predecessors used the church as the secular center of African-American social, political, and economic activity. As the strongest and most long-lived African-American owned and controlled institution outside of historically African-American colleges and universities, the church could play a key role in rescuing the current and future generations of African-American children and young people from ignorance, poverty, drug abuse, homelessness, and hopelessness.

For example, African-American churches could conduct literacy programs for children and young people who have difficulty reading, and remedial tutorial programs for students in English, math, and the sciences, areas in which many innercity African-American students experience the most difficulty. Because of the high cost of a college education today, many African-American churches have scholarship programs. Through bake sales, church dinners, and other fundraising activities, congregations are able to help finance the tuition of some of their young members. They could extend this practice to all community youth.

African-American churches could conduct drug abuse prevention and education programs for children and youth.

African-American professionals who are members of churches could agree to be mentors to children and youth, teaching them what they need to know to enter such fields as law, education, medicine, engineering, and others. Churches could foster mentoring programs for this purpose. Mentors could also hold classes in churches to teach young people the skills involved in seeking and obtaining jobs, from how to write a résumé to how to conduct oneself during a job interview.

Increasingly churches have become involved in financing and building low-cost homes. An example of this is the Nehemiah plan in the Brownsville section of Brooklyn, which is in my congressional district. Named after the Biblical prophet of the fifth century who rebuilt Jerusalem, the Nehemiah plan was a project of more than 40 churches, known collectively as East Brooklyn churches. This interracial, interdenominational coalition created a revolving, interest-free construction fund that eliminated the need to borrow from banks and made it possible to pay contractors immediately. New York City provided free land, almost all of it city-owned, taken for nonpayment of taxes, and New York State provided low-interest mortgages within the reach of working poor and low-income people. The project became the inspiration for the Housing and Community Development Act of 1987, which the Congress passed in December of that year, and it was signed into law February 5, 1988.

The latter part of this century and the 21st century will be crucial periods for African-America, particularly for the youth. We are in danger of losing our youth to the ravages of poverty, homelessness, unemployment, drug abuse, and illiteracy unless we as a people demand the wisest and fullest possible investment by America in education, job training, housing, community development, and economic opportunities. After sustaining unprecedented damage as a people under 200 years of criminal enslavement, and an additional 100 years of governmental abuse and neglect, we need and deserve massive reparations.

The African-American churches in this country must be among those of our institutions and our leaders who spearhead our demands for the full payment of reparations debt by the year 2019, 30 years from the installation of the new Bush administration. Just as the African-American churches formed the organizational base for the antislavery and civil rights movements of the 19th and 20th centuries, so must they take the initiative in pushing our Government to take urgent action on this critical matter. By generating its own social service programs and by demanding national long-term commitments to African-America in the nature and spirit of a "Marshall Plan," African-American churches will once again become relevant and necessary to the lives of African-American people as they were in the early 19th century when they began.

1989: CENTENNIAL YEAR OF THE NATIONAL ZOO

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a joint resolution to designate 1989 as the centennial year of the National Zoo. It was 100 years ago today that the National Zoological Park of the Smithsonian Institution was established by the Congress of the United States.

The National Zoological Park was established by Act of Congress on March 2, 1889

"for the advancement of science and the instruction and recreation of the people" with strong support by Smithsonian Secretary Samuel P. Langley. A year later the zoo was placed under the supervision of the Smithsonian regents and encompassed the Institution's Department of Living Animals, which for several years had been situated on the Mall behind the Castle building.

It was and is the only federally funded zoo in the United States, and was the first zoo to be established for the avowed purpose of conserving wild animals driven to the edge of extinction by man's activities.

Now some 3,500 mammals, reptiles, amphibians, and birds, along with 4,000 invertebrates and many specimen trees and other plants from around the world occupy the original 163-acre site in Washington's Rock Creek Valley. While visitors enjoy and learn, the zoo's scientists, curators, and veterinarians care for the animals and pursue the urgent work of learning to conserve and increase the viability of threatened and endangered species of the world. To this end, the zoo also maintains a 3,000-acre Conservation and Research Center in Front Royal, VA, in fulfillment of its founding commitment to the conservation of wildlife.

In its second century the National Zoo, like all zoos, must face the challenges and changes of the future. Worldwide urbanization, environmental degradation, and extinction of species demand a heightened response in both science and education to create the means and the will to mitigate these destructive trends. In science the zoo will maintain and strengthen its leadership in basic research, animal husbandry, and animal health, and in training wildlife and park managers in the Third World nations where most of the Earth's rich biological diversity is under siege. In public education the zoo is creating a new form—the biological park, or Biopark—which integrates all facets of life in displays of animals and plants, artifacts that explain scientific principles, and artistic works tying mankind to the rest of the natural world.

The National Zoo is a national and international leader among zoos, a dynamic and conspicuous bureau of the Smithsonian Institution, and a resource and refuge for visitors from Washington, the United States, and the world. In its centennial year a congressional resolution of commemoration, celebration, and rededication is most fitting.

As the senior congressional regent from the House, I extend my congratulations to the National Zoo staff for a hundred years of excellence and my best wishes for the future.

Mr. Speaker, I hope this resolution will be expeditiously considered by the House to further commemorate the significance of our National Zoo.

THE TOBACCO EXPORT REFORM ACT OF 1989

HON. MEL LEVINE

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Tobacco Export Reform Act, which will require that cigarettes for export be subject to the same labeling and advertising restrictions as cigarettes sold in the United States. It will also prevent the U.S. Government from actively promoting tobacco industry efforts to open new markets.

The U.S. tobacco industry, frustrated by Americans' increasing concern about the serious dangers of smoking and the declining percentage of Americans who smoke, has turned its attention to creating new markets in Asia and Africa. Using hard-sell tactics, U.S. tobacco companies are luring women and teenagers, groups that traditionally have not smoked in great numbers in those countries. The industry is taking advantage of the lower level of awareness abroad of the serious health consequences of tobacco use, and the fewer restrictions on advertising and labeling in foreign countries.

At a time when health authorities in our own country have likened the addictive properties of nicotine to those of cocaine and heroin, and have gone to increasing lengths to encourage Americans to kick the habit, tobacco companies are now preying on foreign consumers to pick up the slack in sales.

It is even more disturbing that the U.S. Government has often been an enthusiastic advocate of tobacco promotion abroad. The U.S. Trade Representative has used the threat of section 301 trade sanctions to force open markets or change marketing practices in Japan, South Korea, and Taiwan in recent years. Trade negotiators have treated advertising restrictions as nontariff trade barriers; they were partially successful in lifting an advertising ban in Taiwan; they were even more successful in forcing open Japanese and Korean markets. U.S. Government officials also tried to thwart a Hong Kong ban on smokeless tobacco products. And the U.S.-targeted export assistance program and the cooperator foreign market development program provide U.S. taxpayer dollars for the purpose of developing foreign markets for U.S. tobacco.

My legislation will require that tobacco products sold abroad carry the same warning labels on packaging and advertising, as well as the same restrictions on advertising, as those sold in this country under the Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act. We should not have one set of health standards for Americans and another for foreign nationals. At a minimum, we should disclose the health dangers of tobacco when we sell or advertise these products abroad. If the importing nation has labeling and advertising requirements that are substantially similar to or more stringent than those set forth in the U.S. law, the President may waive this requirement.

This legislation would further restrict U.S. Government authorities from promoting the reduction or elimination of foreign country restrictions on the advertising, sale, manufacture, promotion, or distribution of tobacco products.

When 2.5 million deaths a year worldwide are attributed to cigarette smoking, it is irresponsible for the United States to export this dangerous product without health warnings. It is a further display of cynical disregard for the health of the world's citizens when U.S. Government officials are actively engaged in the promotion of a product that causes heart disease, lung cancer, birth defects, and death.

It's time that we brought our trade policy in line with our health policy and stop the double standard on tobacco promotion. The authority of the U.S. Government should not back the export of death and disease. I urge my colleagues to lend their support to the Tobacco Export Reform Act.

STANDOFF AT EASTERN AIRLINES

HON. GEORGE (BUDDY) DARDEN

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. DARDEN. Mr. Speaker, the Eastern Airlines machinists' strike which looms over us today could—if it becomes a reality—do far more than bring one major air carrier to a halt; it is very possible that the entire transportation structure across much of this Nation could be thrown into chaos. If the strike spreads to workers outside Eastern, we face the prospect of a massive disruption of commerce by air, rail, and road.

The Railway Labor Act provides a mechanism for the Government to deal with just such a strike situation, through creation of a Presidential emergency board to seek common ground between management and labor. In light of the danger to our whole interstate commerce structure posed by the current standoff at Eastern, I believe it is only prudent for President Bush to name members to such an emergency board.

Mr. Speaker, the members of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, and the AFL-CIO, recognize the grave consequences for interstate commerce which may result from a work stoppage at Eastern. At the same time, they cannot accept the terms which have been offered by Eastern management, and management has given no indication that it is prepared to meet the conditions sought by unionized workers. Clearly, we are at an impasse—and the creation of a Presidential emergency board is the logical remedy.

DORIS BRAY, OUR LADY FOR ALL SEASONS

HON. JERRY LEWIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, every community should be so lucky to have a person like Doris Bray to be one of its most celebrated citizens.

Doris Bray was born July 2, 1905, in Santa Monica, CA. She received a bachelor of arts degree in 1926 and completed graduate studies in 1931 from the University of California at Los Angeles. Her career centered upon public administration and consulting until she married Emmett W. Bray and became a resident of Trona, CA, in 1955. Three years later Doris became owner and publisher of the Trona Argonaut, a weekly newspaper in the Trona area, which is still in operation. In 1963 Doris was instrumental in helping to establish the Searles Valley Community Services Council and has been the executive director of that organization until her retirement this last December.

In addition to Doris' full-time responsibilities with the Trona Argonaut and community services council, she was able to find the time and energy to serve her community in many leadership capacities. She was president of the board of directors for the Trona Ambulance Service, a longtime member of the Patton State Hospital advisory board and a member of the municipal advisory council, a post to which she was appointed by the San Bernardino County Supervisors in 1985.

Doris is a member and past president of Searles Lake Branch of the American Association of University Women, Trona Community Chest, Trona Business & Professional Women, Searles Lake Veterans Foreign Wars [VFW] Auxiliary, and VFW Auxiliary; and past officer of California State VFW Auxiliary.

Many people either do not have the time or do not take the time to share their knowledge with others; not Doris Bray. She is the author of "A Law is Born, Ballarat Facts and Folklore," and has written numerous magazine articles for professional journals in the field of public administration. Her creativity seems boundless. In addition to all of the above, Doris has also directed 26 plays protraying early mining camp life.

Maybe the last words said are most important. Doris Bray is friend—a friend to endless numbers in Trona and California—and a friend to this Member of Congress. Doris is not just a friend because she is a fellow Bruin, she's not just a friend because she loves her community. Doris is a friend because you just can't help but love our lady for all seasons.

TRIBUTE TO THE KALAMAZOO JUNIOR SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

HON. HOWARD WOLPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I want to pay tribute to the Kalamazoo Junior Symphony Orchestra on the occasion of its golden anniversary.

The Kalamazoo Junior Symphony Orchestra was founded in 1939 by Eugene Andrie and has since become one of the Nation's most prestigious youth ensembles. On March 4 an event has been planned to celebrate the symphony's history. Fifty former students will return to Kalamazoo and be led by Andrie in a musical tribute to the harmonious ensemble which helped to shape their lives.

As a regional group, the Kalamazoo Junior Symphony Orchestra draws its members from throughout southwestern Michigan. It is a uniquely independent organization that receives its financial support from a variety of area corporations, foundations, and patrons, and most notably, from the endless carwashes, candy bar sales, and other fundraising activities organized by symphony members and their families.

The extraordinary success of the Kalamazoo Junior Symphony is attributed to a supportive musical community which boasts a number of outstanding local school string programs, and to the high musical standards set long ago and maintained by Andrie and his talented successors. In 1943, the orchestra came under the direction of a close, personal friend, Julius Stulberg, who led the symphony for 31 years. He was succeeded in 1974 by Herbert Butler who, in turn, passed the baton to the Kalamazoo Junior Symphony's current leader, Robert Ritsema, in 1979.

Mr. Speaker, those who have been privileged to be a part of the Kalamazoo Junior Symphony Orchestra—as performer, board member, or contributor—take pride in the orchestra's remarkable musical achievements. I am honored to represent constituents who, through their involvement with the Kalamazoo Junior Symphony Orchestra, have given so much to their community and its cultural environment.

LEGISLATION TO ASSIST INDIAN VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to introduce legislation assisting the cause of Indian vocational education. Currently, only two tribal institutions exist nationwide which are solely dedicated to providing quality vocational education for American Indians: The Crownpoint Institute of Technology located in my own district in New Mexico, and the United Tribes Technical College in Bismark, SD.

Over the past decade, our Nation's economy has changed dramatically from an industrial-based economy to one that is increasingly service-based. This has precipitated a change in our training needs as more and more of the jobs in high demand require specialized, vocational training. These jobs range from the construction trades—masonry, plumbing, carpentry, electricians, sheet metal workers, and heavy equipment mechanics to food services, medical records technicians, nursing, and the computer fields, among others. Many of these specialized employment fields can be taught in short-term training programs that yield high annual wages ranging from entry level wages of $8,500 to $20,400.

At the same time, problems in the national economy become magnified on many of our Nation's Indian reservations. American Indians currently suffer from one of the Nation's highest unemployment rates. The unemployment rate on the Navajo Reservation is seven times that of the United States at large, with an average unemployment rate of 37 percent. In addition, it is estimated only 55 percent of American Indians complete high school. College attendance rates for American Indians remain the lowest for any minority group with only 17 percent of young American Indians going on to college. The reasons for this are many, including the hardships of leaving one's homeland to attend college in an unfamiliar urban environment, and the prohibitive costs of higher education.

For these and other reasons, it is imperative that we invest in vocational education, particularly as the Indian tribes of our Nation confront the problems of high dropout rates and unemployment through economic diversification and tribal economic development.

Currently, the Crownpoint Institute of Technology and the United Tribes Technical College are the only two tribal institutions struggling to provide specialized vocational job training for American Indians. These two institutions are the only Indian tribal educational institutions which are not provided for by Federal authorizing statute. Because they are not State institutions, they cannot look to city, county, or State levies for funding. Absent tax generating economies, tribal governments cannot provide adequate support.

As a result, their sources of funding are competitive and soft, and frequently absent. Without dependable funding, long-term planning becomes impossible. In fact, at times, only portions of a course can be offered because a onetime funding source is no longer available. More critically, at the end of 1 school year, it is not unusual for these institutions to be uncertain about whether they will be able to open for classes for the continuing year. In short, because of their unique status, they have been overlooked by every funding source and have simply fallen through the cracks.

Despite the tremendous odds facing these institutions, the Crownpoint Institute of Technology has graduated over 1,150 Indian adults into the Nation's work force, skilled from among 25 fully accredited, intensive training programs. Virtually all of these graduates entered CIT unemployed and without any job skills.

UTTC also has an excellent record. UTTC currently serves 275 students from 40 tribes and 13 States. While a majority of UTTC's students initially receive public assistance, UTTC has a solid record of graduating and assisting 70 percent of its graduates in finding gainful employment. Thus, both the Crownpoint Institute of Technology and the United Tribes Technical College enable their graduates to leave the welfare rolls forever and become gainfully employed. More importantly, these institutions are critical to the transformation of these graduates into proud, productive citizens contributing to tribal and State economies.

Among other things, the legislation I am offering today will provide a stable, basic funding source for the Crownpoint and United Tribes Technical College institutions based upon their current expenditures and costs. It will also increase the current native American set-aside in the Carl Perkins Vocational Education Act reserved for tribal and tribal organization vocational projects. This increase will be subject to a matching commitment from tribes which may be in cash, in kind, or from other Federal sources. I am pleased this legislation will also encourage tribally controlled community colleges to develop vocational projects relating to and emphasizing tribal economic development. Finally, it will create a National Indian Center for Research in Vocational-Technical Training designed to provide input into Indian economic development policy.

In closing, I emphasize that Federal investments in native American vocational education can be expected to be returned multifold. For instance, in just 6 years of employment, one Crownpoint graduate will have returned in taxes the cost of his or her education. In New Mexico alone, one graduating class can be expected to earn $1.2 million in 1 year and contribute over $460,000 to the tax base. Contrast this to the cost of maintaining these individuals and their families on public assistance and it is clear this legislation is worthy of Federal investment. The time has come to provide these valuable institutions serving Indian people the same basic funding opportunities afforded to all other educational institutions.

THE DOMESTIC VOLUNTEER SERVICE ACT PROGRAMS OF NATIONAL SIGNIFICANCE

HON. OLYMPIA J. SNOWE

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, today, I am pleased to introduce legislation which would amend the Domestic Volunteer Service Act [DVSA] by establishing three programs of national significance within the Retired Senior Volunteer Program [RSVP]. These programs of national significance are intergenerational programs for afterschool library latchkey children, respite care programs for family caregivers, and programs to monitor guardianships.

Establishing programs of national significance is a way in which to recognize initiatives that some RSVP's have already undertaken. Further, these programs of national significance help to identify areas that should have a national focus for volunteer activities. While they are not mandates, these programs are one way of helping RSVP directors to better target their limited resources.

As you know, voluntarism has had a long and proud tradition throughout American history. Thus, it is fitting that Congress has sought to foster that tradition through its support for ACTION. RSVP is one of the several programs that provides the opportunity for retired persons to give their volunteer services in various settings.

For example, RSVP volunteers have provided assistance to orthopedically handicapped children, to homebound individuals needing shopping assistance or friendly visiting, to families needing respite care, and to refugees in need of literacy training. One program in Lewiston, ME, is a neighborhood afterschool program which provides activities in a supervised setting for children under 12. RSVP programs serve a variety of community needs.

Thus, when I heard about the growing problem of latchkey children in libraries because of a lack of adequate afterschool programs, I began to wonder if we might not turn this situation to an advantage.

Unfortunately, many working families are struggling to find adequate, affordable day care for their children. With the average annual cost of care totaling $3,000 per child, finding quality care can be an impossible task. Currently, 2.1 million children, ages 5 to 13 years, regularly spend some period of time without adult supervision afterschool.

Libraries, since the turn of the century, have made a commitment to serving the needs of children. Nothing, however, has prepared them to deal with the deluge of unsupervised children who, on a regular basis, are spending extended periods of time in the library because of a lack of day care.

In May 1988, the American Library Association indicated that "what to do with and about library latchkey children has become one of the most rapidly developing public library policy arenas." Exemplifying that problem, the report cited the Brooklyn Public Library which has 100 or more unattended children a day; and Los Angeles County which in 1985 found about 2,000 children a day whose parents used the libraries as an afterschool center. In places as disparate as Illinois, Texas, and Oregon, librarians are trying to cope with a problem that is really a community problem—how shall we care for our children and who shall be responsible.

One solution I have proposed is the Intergenerational Library Literacy Act. This legislation relies on older volunteers who will work with libraries interested in developing afterschool literacy and reading skills programs for latchkey children. Additionally, older volunteers, through program and example, will stress positive images of aging.

Support for this bill has been widespread. Indeed, it was at the recommendation of the president of the National Association of RSVP directors that I included the concept of programs of national significance in order to permit RSVP to better direct volunteers into these library programs if such programs meet the needs of the community. In this way, RSVP could provide a core of volunteers upon which libraries could build their programs.

Another area of great concern has been the need to support the efforts of family caregivers. As you know, in December 1988 a study by ACTION found both RSVP and Senior Companion Program [SCP] volunteers offered respite services to caregivers. RSVP volunteers were found to spend about 15 percent of their time in providing services to family caregivers. Most organizations surveyed who received RSVP and SCP help indicated that without these volunteers, "they either could not operate or would have to curtail respite activities." Volunteers were found to derive a sense of satisfaction from providing respite services because they were aware of the value of allowing caregivers the opportunity to take breaks from their caregiving activities.

Unfortunately, the study found that large numbers of caregivers are wait-listed and that the insufficient supply of volunteers was a principal reason for limitations on respite care. For this reason, establishing respite care as a targeted program may help to provide greater emphasis on services to caregivers.

Finally, we are all aware of the problems that abound in the guardianship programs. Wards are individuals whose legal rights, decisionmaking authority, and possessions have been transferred to the control of a guardian or conservator based on a judgment that the ward is no longer able to take care of these matters.

Today, as many as 500,000 adults may have been made wards under court guardianship or conservatorship programs. While guardians can protect the well-being of those incapable of protecting themselves, the current fragmented system provides few safeguards to wards.

The idea of guardian advocates to monitor guardianship programs was first addressed in legislation I introduced in the last Congress and which was reintroduced in January. Advocates can be trained by the courts to explain what wards can expect from the court system, to provide support, and in general serve as the eyes and ears of the court system's monitoring process. I believe that RSVP volunteers could serve as a cadre around which to develop a program of volunteer advocates.

These proposals, while not binding on any community, will permit the idea of these intergenerational library programs, respite care programs, and guardianship monitoring programs to develop and grow. Indeed, by encouraging their development in communities across the country, RSVP directors could benefit from the experiences of their counterparts in order to develop recruitment, training, and placement models.

As the population ages, there will continue to be an increasingly large number of older adults who seek meaningful opportunities for contributing to society outside of paid employment. Older volunteers bring with them a lifetime of experience which many are eager to share.

The text of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act, programs of national significance follows:

H.R. 1272

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. PROGRAMS OF NATIONAL SIGNIFICANCE UNDER RETIRED SENIOR VOLUNTEERS PROGRAM.

Part A of title II of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973 (42 U.S.C. 5001 et seq.) is amended by adding at end the following new section:

"PROGRAMS OF NATIONAL SIGNIFICANCE

"SEC. 202. In making grants under section 201 and determining the amount of the grants, the Director shall give priority to programs of national significance, such as—

"(1) volunteer programs in libraries during afterschool hours to provide literacy and reading skills training for children whose parents are not at home during afterschool hours;

"(2) guardianship monitoring programs; and

"(3) respite care programs.".

SEC. 2. CONFORMING AMENDMENT.

The table of contents in the 1st section of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973 (42 U.S.C. 4950 prec.) is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 201 the following new item:

"Sec. 202. Programs of national significance.".

FIVE-YEAR BICENTENNIAL COMPETITION ON THE CONSTITUTION AND THE BILL OF RIGHTS

HON. ARTHUR RAVENEL, JR.

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. RAVENEL. Mr. Speaker, as most of you know, we're in the second year of the 5-year bicentennial competition on the Constitution and Bill of Rights. On February 15, South Carolina held its statewide competition and I am most proud to say that the First Congressional District winner, R.B. Stall High School, went on to take first place.

R.B. Stall High School won last year's competition as well, but none of the students from last year's class are among the participants this year—the only repeat is the teacher. The fact that Mrs. Karen Gabe Gibson has been able to produce another winning team speaks well of her outstanding talents. She has the respect of her students and the support of her peers. The school principal, Mike Turner, has been a diligent endorser of the bicentennial competition and worked untiringly last year in planning and fundraising efforts necessary to send our team to Washington for the national competition.

It is important to note here the support my office receives. Countless citizens have given freely of their time to help in training, judging and organizing. This is an impressive, worthwhile program that tends to be addictive—once people have volunteered, most are only too happy to help again. No congressional staff can afford to devote the time this project requires. Without the expertise and enthusiasm of Susan Boykin and Pam Tuttle of the South Carolina Department of Youth Services, who are kind enough to be the district coordinators, we could not have the quality of competition these fine students deserve.

It is indeed an honor to individually list the names of the members of the winning class that will be representing the State of South Carolina in our Nation's Capital in May.

THE NORTHEAST-MIDWEST CONGRESSIONAL COALITION TAKES AIM

HON. BARBARA B. KENNELLY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, the 101st Congress faces an array of critical challenges that profoundly impact the economy and quality of life throughout Northeastern and Midwestern States. The Northeast-Midwest Coalition has outlined its regional policy agenda for the 101st Congress in our biweekly newsletter, the Northeast-Midwest Economic Review. As vice chair of the coalition, I would like to share the following excerpt from the Economic Review with my colleagues and I encourage coalition members to become involved in this regional agenda.

HUMAN RESOURCES

LABOR MARKET INFORMATION

Members of Congress need timely and reliable data if they are to address effectively the human resource issues of a changing economy. They rely on labor market information both for policy development and resource allocation at the federal level, and for ensuring that at the local level the poor and unemployed receive good advice and guidance to make their way into productive jobs in the economic mainstream. The Institute has prepared a series of publications on how policymakers can improve labor market information, and it sponsored a Congressional briefing on the topic.

Throughout 1989, the Institute will organize a series of regional conferences among state Employment Security officials, training and education administrators, and other state policymakers to explore the most pressing state needs in the labor market information field, particularly the need for improved data on the subsequent employment experiences of dislocated workers and of training program completers, in order to design more efficient and effective employment and training policies. The Coalitions, meanwhile, will promote initiatives that add two statistical programs—one on changing occupational skill requirements and one on worker mobility—to the existing LMI programs. Also included in these initiatives is support for improving the accuracy of local unemployment statistics used in many federal allocation formulas for grants to states and localities.

DISLOCATED WORKERS

Of particular concern to the Northeast and Midwest are the thousands of unemployed workers dislocated from the region's traditional manufacturing industries. Growth in new high-technology and service businesses has helped put some of these workers back on the job, but others who lack sufficient basic or occupational skills face the prospect of permanent unemployment.

The Institute plans to publish a guide book this year that reviews research on dislocation issues and explains examples of exemplary dislocated workers programs. The guide will be directed to policymakers and planners at the state and local level. The Coalitions, meanwhile, will promote initiatives that provide states with incentives to upgrade the job skills of unemployment benefit recipients and that improve job counseling and skills-testing programs in the Employment Service Labor Market Information.

Members of Congress need timely and reliable data if they are to address effectively the human resource development issues of a changing economy. They also need updated labor market information if they are to ensure that the poor and unemployed receive good advice and guidance to make their way into producive jobs in the economic mainstream. The Northeast-Midwest Institute has prepared a series of publication on how policymakers can improve labor market information, and it sponsored a Congressional briefing on the topic.

Throughout 1989, the Institute will organize a series of regional conferences among Employment Service officials, demographers, and policymakers to enhance the understanding of labor market dynamics, particularly the subsequent employment experiences of dislocated workers and of training program completers, in order to design more efficient and effective employment and training policies. The Coalitions, meanwhile, will promote initiatives that add two statistical programs—one on occupational skill requirements and one on worker mobility—to the LMI programs currently authorized in the Job Training Partnership Act.

EDUCATION AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

As the nation and the region face a profound economic transformation, we must first identify our people—our human capital, if you will—as the major resource for revitalizing our economy. Technology and management ability are critical factors, but economic growth and renewal ultimately depend upon our work force. They depend on whether we, as a nation, can provide our people with the education, training, and job opportunities that will allow them to reach their full potential and attain security in their personal lives. Perhaps no asset is more critical to this revitalization than our public and private educational system.

In 1988, the Institute received a major grant from the Carnegie Corporation of New York to organize a series of six field conferences that identified ways for schools to improve the local economy and prepare students for new economic conditions. The one-day conferences, hosted by Members of Congress, aimed to create ongoing task forces among local educators, elected officials, economic development administrators, and business leaders to promote a more flexible school system that can enhance local economic development.

Conferences were hosted by: Representatives Howard Wolpe and Fred Upton in Kalamazoo, Michigan; Representative Charles Rangel in New York City; Representatives Frank Horton and Louise Slaughter in Rochester, New York; Representative Claudine Schneider in Providence, Rhode Island; Representative Thomas Sawyer in Akron, Ohio. The Institute also held a briefing in Washington to discuss the project's findings and recommendations. A report on the conferences and the possible linkages between education and economic development will be released in early 1989.

DEMOGRAPHIC AND ECONOMIC TRENDS

Each year, the Institute releases a detailed report on demographic and economic trends in the Northeast-Midwest region. Where possible, The State of the Region outlines various projections for development and examines the fundamental forces driving the Northeast-Midwest economy. The report's second section reviews trends in each of the region's 18 states. The third section presents detailed tables on demographic and economic data.

As an increased service to its various constituents, the Institute sponsors a series of monthly briefings on the state of the region. On the fourth Wednesday of each month, Members of Congress host informal breakfasts and discussions with some of the nation's leading demographers. Recent sessions have focused on the 1990 census and redistricting, employment and workforce trends, labor market information, residential segregation, and the federal statistical system.

RAY SIEBERT RETIRES

HON. JERRY LEWIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize my lifelong friend, Ray Siebert, who on March 4, 1989, will retire after serving the U.S. Postal Service and the community of Rialto for over 31 years.

I have to say that Ray has served his community in more than one way. He has been an active member and served as deacon and elder of the San Bernardino Christian Church. He is a past president of the Kiwanis Club, past president of local 406 of the Postal Supervisors and local 411 of the National Association of Letter Carriers and past president of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, Aerie 506.

Ray has contributed immeasurably to the smooth operation of our local communities postal delivery system; so much so, that he moved up in the ranks to the position of postmaster in Rialto this last year. For many years he acted as the liaison officer between the U.S. Postal Service and the 35th Congressional District office, paving the way for positive resolution of many postal problems. Ray Siebert got this far by subscribing all the while to the idea that his friends', neighbors' and fellow residents' lives would be less troublesome if the mail service functioned properly—and it has for over 31 years.

Ray has lived in San Bernardino County since childhood and I have known him since we attended San Bernardino High School together. He and his wife Claudette have been married for 34 years and raised their two daughters Shawnie and Lonnie in the 35th District. Upon his retirement, Ray and his wife Claudette plan to take their fifth wheeler RV and begin to see the United States. Mr. Speaker, I ask that you join me today in saluting Ray Siebert. While his presence in the postal community will be greatly missed, his many years of dedication will serve as a reminder that this postal patriarch did exist. It is with great respect that I pay tribute to him today.

THE INF TREATY AND DEFENSE BURDEN SHARING

HON. ANDY IRELAND

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this year marks the 40th anniversary of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization [NATO], and it's about time for a major reassessment of this country's financial commitment to that alliance. The world is a much different place than it was right after World War II, when America was the only Western nation with the economic and military might necessary to fill the vacuum left by the decimation of Europe.

Today, thanks in large part to the Marshall plan and United States help in the past four decades, our friends and foes alike from the Second World War have become economic powers in their own right. Yet we continue to bear the financial burdens of defending Western Euopean soil and protecting the trade routes around the globe that are the lifelines of prosperity for our major allies. About 60 percent of the U.S. defense budget goes toward the protection, not of United States territory, but of Western Europe. We spend between $160 and $170 billion per year on NATO—more than the contributions of the other 15 NATO members combined. The number of United States military personnel stationed in Europe increased from 145,000 in 1950 to 340,000 in 1988. That trend has continued upward in the past 20 years, with few deviations. Meanwhile, we run record budget deficits and maintain intolerable trade imbalances with many of the nations whose defense we support with our tax dollars.

The United States must take the lead if we are ever to achieve a fair sharing of the financial burdens and military risks that come with supporting NATO and our other alliances. I firmly believe that a strong leadership effort by the President, with full backing from the Department of Defense and the Department of State, will bring about equitable defense burden sharing with our allies.

However, it appears that Congress must take the first step if we are to get anywhere, and I rise today to do just that. My distinguished colleague PAT SCHROEDER and I have introduced legislation to send a clear message from Congress to the administration and our allies—that the American taxpayer cannot continue to shoulder the burden of defending Western Europe.

The dismantling of the intermediate nuclear forces under the treaty signed by President Reagan and Soviet Premier Gorbachev and ratified by the Senate last year provides a good opportunity to demonstrate to our allies that we mean business on burden sharing. Congresswoman SCHROEDER and I have introduced a resolution that calls for the withdrawal of all civilian and military personnel assigned to the INF forces once the destruction of those weapons is complete in 1991.

The Department of Defense has not been forthcoming with information as to the status of personnel assigned to the Pershing II and ground-based cruise missiles [GLCM's] or the Department's plans for the reassigning of those personnel when the INF dismantling is complete. According to figures provided my office by the Army and the Air Force, there are at least 24,821 military and civilian personnel connected with INF forces currently stationed in the Netherlands, Belgium, West Germany, Italy, and Great Britain. Those people should be brought home when the missiles they service have been deactivated.

The destruction of the INF forces and reassignment of INF personnel should result in significant savings. The Department of Defense, in its amended budget request for fiscal years 1988 and 1989, promised savings of at least $459 million, including $132 million in personnel costs in 1989 alone. Those savings would be offset somewhat by the costs of missile transportation, destruction, verification inspection, and personnel assignments, but the Department has not said what the net savings should be when all is said and done. In fact, if the Army and Air Force reassign INF personnel to fill alleged shortages in Europe, retain existing units there longer than planned, or even create new units in Europe, we may be spending more than we were before the INF Treaty was enacted.

This cannot be allowed to happen. Maintaining or increasing our presence in Europe, in light of the elimination of the INF forces and despite intense public pressure to achieve equal burden sharing and reduce the budget deficit, would be irresponsible indeed. We can and must maintain our strength without spending money and assigning personnel where they are not needed. Current trends in the international arena, as well as mounting budgetary pressures, argue for a shrinking of force structures and a reduction of overseas deployments, not a mere shifting of personnel from one European base or headquarters to another.

With insufficient and incomplete information from the Pentagon on this subject, I have asked the General Accounting Office [GAO] to examine several key issues and provide information on exactly what the Department of Defense intends to do with our INF personnel. Specifically, I have asked GAO to answer the following questions:

How many personnel are involved and what is the schedule for their reassignment and their precise unit destinations?

How will the Pershing and GLCM personnel reductions be accomplished—through transfers, attrition, reduction in force, separation or what?

Are personnel being reassigned to meet valid requirements in combat units or headquarters units?

Are the new assignments compatible with skill levels and specialty training found among INF personnel?

Has the overall NATO troop ceiling been adjusted to reflect Pershing and GLCM deactivations?

Is DOD remaining within the congressionally mandated NATO troops ceiling?

What has happened to the savings projected by DOD in its amended budget request for fiscal years 1988 and 1989?

On a related issue, I have also asked the GAO to determine the extent of DOD's compliance with recommendations made last February on reducing manpower levels and overhead cost in the military. The recommendations were put forth in a study entitled, "Review of Unified and Specified Command Headquarters," commissioned by then Secretary of Defense Frank Carlucci and undertaken by Derek Vander Schaaf, Deputy DOD Inspector General. The study reviewed our worldwide military command headquarters structure, with an eye toward streamlining foreign operations and reducing the number of unnecessary personnel stationed abroad.

The study documents significant duplication of functions, excessive layering of organization structures and overlapping responsibilities among the various command headquarters. The report recommends the elimination of 7,309 military and civilian positions from the headquarters structure by the end of the current fiscal year, yielding savings of up to $336 million in fiscal year 1990 and $1.7 billion over the next 5 years.

In a report to Congress last December, Secretary Carlucci stated that 3,000 military and civilian spaces would be eliminated from Unified and Specified Command Headquarters, and that these reductions would be reflected in the Department's budget submission for fiscal years 1990 and 1991. I have asked the GAO to review the Department's plans for implementing the reductions outlined in Secretary Carlucci's report to Congress. GAO will determine to what extent the reductions have been incorporated in the Departments 5 years defense plan for fiscal years 1990–94 and provide a detailed breakdown as to how the reductions are being accomplished.

Armed with adequate information as to the Pentagon's policies toward our European-based personnel, Congress can determine what has been done and what remains to be done to achieve equitable burden sharing. We can make a thoughtful assessment of what our present and future role should be in maintaining the defense of the alliance, while giving due consideration to budgetary realities. The first step toward burden sharing will come with an honest admission on the part of the Defense Department, the administration and Congress that we cannot go on like we have for the past several decades. We must make the best use of the funds appropriated for the national defense, not maintain a bloated force structure abroad just for the sake of it. Until we make substantive moves to reduce our personnel in Europe, our NATO allies will never believe that we are serious about burden sharing. The resolution that we have introduced today and the study that I have requested from the GAO will leave no doubts in their minds as to the intent of Congress in this regard.

THE RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION LENDING ASSISTANT IMPROVEMENTS ACTS OF 1989

HON. JIM BATES

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, today I introduce the Rural Electrification Administration Lending Assistance Improvements Act of 1989. Not only is my proposal bipartisan, covering the full spectrum of congressional political thought, it is also supported by the National Taxpayers Union, the National Tax Equality Association, the National Propane Gas Association, the Alliance for Fair Competition, and other worthwhile associations of public interest.

This legislation would bring REA lending programs in line with changes in the conditions of rural electric and telephone service. When the program was begun in 1936, few farms had electricity or telephones. Today, these services are available from the Florida Keys to remote Alaskan villages above the Arctic Circle. Quality rural utilities are available in every corner of rural America.

But with REA's original task seemingly all but completed, the REA is still going strong, pumping taxpayer money—about $1 billion annually—into areas of the country far removed from the little house on the prairie. And, this money is highly subsidized.

Over the last 15 years, the value of REA subsidies amounts to over $50 billion. Some of these moneys subsidize the power from REA-backed nontaxpaying cooperatives to recharge golf carts at Hilton Head Island, the spa where 18 holes can run $97.50. Other subsidized loans provide power to Kuwait Investment Co.'s pleasure island of Kiawah, SC, as well as other sunshine resorts.

Mr. Speaker, Federal below-market-rate loans don't end with the sunshine resorts. Tax-free REA cooperatives also provide power to the burgeoning leisure economies and condominium complexes of Vail, Aspen, and Snowmass.

Simply stated, these ski playgrounds and the sunshine tanning centers of the wealthy don't require high-subsidy loan assistance. This legislation would reform these unnecessary subsidies.

Mr. Speaker, a good question is: Why have such extravagant subsidies so long been tolerated when the country cries for cost cutting budget reform? Well, that's a good question. Simply put, with apologies to Will Rogers, "Some Congressmen never met a spending bill they didn't like."

Today, without question, this legislation makes a clear call for reform. And it does so on a sound base. Today, unlike 1936, nearly all REA borrowers are financially healthy and profitable. Some REA electric power supply borrowers and their affiliated distribution members have assets that exceed companies on the Fortune 100 list of largest U.S. enterprises. Our bill recognizes this change and would make the appropriate reform—by replacing high-subsidy REA direct loans with loan guarantees when assisting legitimate rural borrowers.

Under current law, areas that were rural in former times but are no longer rural continue to receive high subsidy assistance. About 5 percent of REA borrowers serve largely metropolitan areas, not rural areas. During the period 1980 to 1985, these urban and suburban borrowers received nearly 20 percent of all electric loans aimed at rural communities. Our bill says "once a borrower, always a borrower" is bad policy. We would stop this practice and assist only legitimate rural borrowers.

The telephone program is no different. A number of REA borrowers are subsidiaries of major, multimillion dollar telecommunications holding companies. One of these outfits, with sales and assets of $2.6 billion and $5.1 billion respectively, took nearly 10 percent of all telephone loans during the 1980 to 1985 period. As a group, these holding companies, representing 7.5 percent of all telephone borrowers took 25.5 percent of the money between 1980 and 1985. These holding companies are playing in the Euro and Wall Street bond markets. Multimillion dollar companies have no place taking high-subsidy assistance from hard-working taxpayers. Our bill would stop this practice.

Does this legislation cause serious problems in providing affordable, quality utilities to rural America? The answer is no; a resounding no. There would be no drastic increase in farmers' utility bills under our proposal. The Congressional Budget Office and the Office of Management and Budget agree on that. The Congressional Budget Office previously reported that moving to a more market oriented loan rate above the highly subsidized REA rate "* * * would have little effect on most cooperative's rates as interest charges account for only a small percentage of the average ratepayer's bill." The Office of Management and Budget in conjunction with the Department of Agriculture and the Rural Electrification Administration report that the impact on the typical ratepayer would be "only 74 cents per month."

Now Mr. Speaker, does the package save any money? Yes. Projected savings from current services and countable savings for Gramm-Rudman-Hollings purposes result in nearly $5 billion over the next 5 years. This legislation produces savings that are dramatic and real. At the same time, our legislation remains sensitive to rural America. It does not abolish REA nor does it cause a drastic increase in farmer's utility bills. It is a reform bill that provides continued generous Federal assistance to those who need it while eliminating assistance to those who don't.

In those few cases where a borrower is experiencing financial hardship, our legislation provides a wholly reliable safety net. This legislation ensures that a borrower in true need gets direct, high-subsidy assistance. The proposal does not threaten quality, reliable, and affordable service to rural America.

Americans have long been generous to those who truly need help. This attribute is the cornerstone of our country's strength. We help one another. However, unless we open our eyes to changes and make the appropriate reforms in Federal spending, we simply won't have enough resources to meet the critical needs of today. Frankly, no one has to be an expert in rural utility service to know that conditions have changed since REA was created in 1936. The help that was once needed has been largely satisfied.

This legislation can reform the program, and reduce our costs without harming rural America or abolishing REA. It allows us, in a substantial way, to find the resources to meet other urgent needs of today's America.

In essence, our bill follows the advice of Mark Twain, which was, "Do what's right and you'll please some of the people and astound the rest." We have an opportunity here to do what's right and astound those who believe Congress never met a spending bill it didn't like.

I urge my colleagues to join us in supporting this legislation which strikes the proper balance between the legitimate interest of all parties.

Mr. Speaker, the bill follows:

H.R. 1232

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Rural Electrification Administration Lending Assistance Improvements Act of 1989".

In the event that a borrower prepays using tax exempt financing, the discount shall be adjusted to make the discount equivalent to fully taxable financing. The borrower shall certify in writing whether the financing will be tax exempt. In the case of an electric borrower prepaying loans at the discounted present value thereof, no loans, loan guarantees or other financial assistance shall be provided pursuant to this Act to the borrower or its successors or for the purpose of furnishing or improving electric service of the type (that is power supply or distribution) provided by the borrower within the area so served by the borrower. Telephone bank debentures are not guaranteed or otherwise backed by the full faith and credit of the United States and they are to be treated as corporate securities for the purposes of the securities and banking laws.".

(c) paragraph (8) is amended by:

(1) deleting ", if such prepayment is not made later than September 30, 1989"; and

(2) adding at the end the following: "No loans, loan guarantees or other financial assistance shall be provided pursuant to this Act to any borrower prepaying under this section or to its successors or for the purpose of furnishing or improving telephone service in the area served by the borrower.".

SEC. 11. The Rural Electrification Act of 1936 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section 413:

"SEC. 413. TELEPHONE BANK PRIVATIZATION.—The Telephone Bank Board shall (i) begin immediately to undertake to qualify as a member of a federally regulated charter organization or lending insurance agency as appropriate and shall adjust all of its financial reporting to the standards used by said charter organization or lending insurance agency except those standards required under the Budget Control and Impoundment Act of 1975; (ii) begin immediately to take steps to build necessary equity reserves to enable the telephone bank to borrow privately without any form of Federal guarantee, which steps shall include but not be limited to setting a loan interest rate that will develop adequate cash flow to enable the telephone bank to pay interest on private borrowings used to retire Treasury debt and class A stock; (iii) by December 31, 1989, develop an effective implementation plan for privatization as provided in sections 401(b) and 406(c) of this Act; and (iv) by December 31, 1990, hire a competent qualified staff, knowledgeable in private banking practices, to begin the process of converting the telephone bank to a private, independent, lending institution.".

PROTRACTED CONTRACT NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN THE INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MACHINISTS AND AEROSPACE WORKERS AND EASTERN AIRLINES

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, the protracted contract negotiations between the International Association of Machinists & Aerospace Workers and Eastern Airlines has been one of the longest and most visible disputes in memory.

Eastern Airlines recently rejected the National Mediation Board's January 30, 1989, arbitration proposal, bringing about an impasse under the Railway Labor Act, which started a 30-day cooling off period that will end March 3, 1989. After the expiration of that period, management will be free to impose its last offer, and the International Association of Machinists will be forced to strike. As Neil Henderson noted in this morning's Washington Post:

Imagine a Washington workday with no Eastern Airlines service, no Amtrak, no Maryland commuter trains and general confusion throughout the local transportation network as roads grow more congested and trucks carrying food to market don't arrive.

In the interest of averting that worst case scenario, I bring to the attention of my colleagues the following statement by the AFL-CIO Executive Council, which deserves the immediate attention of the President and of Members of Congress:

STATEMENT BY THE AFL-CIO EXECUTIVE COUNCIL ON EASTERN AIR LINES

The protracted confrontation between the employees of Eastern Air Lines and Frank Lorenzo has been one of the longest and most visible disputes in memory.

After misusing the nation's bankruptcy laws to bust the unions on Continental Air Lines, Frank Lorenzo has personally presided over the systematic dismantling of Eastern Air Lines by selling its most profitable assets. He has siphoned off hundreds of millions of dollars from Eastern to Continental and Texas Air. He now claims poverty at Eastern.

In contrast, over the past decade, Eastern's unionized employees have compiled a record of financial sacrifice in their attempts to save their airline, giving up more than $1.5 billion in wages and other concessions. In the current round of negotiations, the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers has conceded to a pay freeze, major work rule changes and reductions in new entry rates.

That show of good faith has not been matched on the management side. After refusing to bargain in good faith throughout the current negotiations that started in September 1987, Eastern rejected immediately the National Mediation Board's January 30 arbitration proposal. Under the Railway Labor Act, that action brought impasse, starting a 30-day period that ends March 3. After that deadline, management is free to impose its last offer and the IAM is free to strike.

Clearly, Frank Lorenzo seeks to force a strike by imposing the wage cuts of 20 to 30 percent, pension reductions and work rule changes—all part of the "offer" Eastern management hasn't changed for 16 months.

In contrast, IAM members sought to bargain, welcomed arbitration and now support the appointment of a Presidential Emergency Board.

The AFL-CIO supports the call for the National Mediation Board to recommend and the President to appoint a Presidential Emergency Board. To prepare for the possibility that no emergency board is named, the AFL-CIO will mobilize its resources to assist the employees at Eastern and calls for action by affiliated unions, state AFL-CIOs and local central bodies for the fullest possible support.

NATIONAL VISITING NURSE ASSOCIATION WEEK

HON. JERRY LEWIS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize and congratulate the Visiting Nurse Association [VNA] of the Inland Counties and its affiliate, Ramona VNA & Hospice, as they celebrate National Visiting Nurse Association Week.

Each day, the VNA staff works with families who are coping with the difficulties of providing a safe environment for a loved one. These people are dedicated to providing quality care in the comfort and convenience of the home setting. As well as traditional home health, they have programs in home maintenance for senior citizens, hypertension, education, health insurance advocacy, and early intervention to maintain infants' health.

I am thankful for associations such as the VNA and Ramona VNA & Hospice; people throughout the Inland Counties need the assistance and care extended by the Visiting Nurse Association and it gives me great pleasure to extend those thanks today on the floor of the House of Representatives. Please join me, Mr. Speaker as I respectfully pay tribute to the Visiting Nurse Association of the Inland Counties and its affiliate, Ramona VNA & Hospice.

U.S. FOREIGN POLICY MUST REFLECT AMERICAN IDEALS

HON. FRANK HORTON

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, our colleague, BILL BROOMFIELD, who is the vice chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, has written an unusually thoughtful article titled: "United States Foreign Policy Must Reflect American Ideals" which appears in the March issue of the New Age magazine.

The magazine is published by the Southern Jurisdiction of the Scottish Rite of Freemasonry with a monthly circulation of nearly 650,000 across the United States.

BILL BROOMFIELD, who was recently elevated to the 33d degree, the highest honor in Freemasonry, contends that a successful American foreign policy must be grounded in two fundamental principles: human rights and economic liberty.

If America is to continue to be both a great and a decent power, it must not be afraid to project those ideals around the world, Representative BROOMFIELD argues.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the following text of BILL BROOMFIELD'S insightful article to my colleagues.

UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY MUST REFLECT AMERICAN IDEALS

(By William S. Broomfield)

Just after the 1988 Presidential election, a news story revealed an interesting fact: the Soviets were quite pleased with the election of George Bush.

The conventional wisdom in America might have suggested otherwise. Many people assume that the Soviets would be more pleased with an administration that took a generally softer line on such issues as arms negotiations and Marxist governments in the Third World.

Yet it was clear from the Soviet response that the Kremlin prized predictability and stability above all other considerations. The Kremlin's attitude is understandable: most of us, whether individuals or institutions, don't like surprises.

I believe the main reason for the success of President Reagan's foreign policy was its predictability. And one reason that it was predictable, one reason the Soviets might not appreciate, was that it was in character. America's foreign policy of the last 8 years has been entirely in character with its most deeply held principles: human rights and economic liberty.

These two principles are not simply declarations on paper that we trot out for Fourth of July speeches. They are part of the American way of life.

And, if our foreign policy is to win friends for us around the world, it also must stem from our deepest principles. That's what President Reagan meant when he referred to the Nation as a "city set upon the hill".

The first ideal that should shine forth to other nations is our commitment to human rights. The freedoms to be found in America are well-known throughout the world. They are not merely theories we read, but habits we practice.

The Soviet Union suffers by comparison. A recent news article shows the difference. It told of young boys and girls forced to work on giant agricultural cooperatives in central Russia. The article pointed out that Soviet law prohibits child labor, but adds that there are no penalties.

There are no penalties because those who wrote the laws clearly did not intend for anyone to take them seriously. They merely wanted something on paper to show a commitment to progressive labor practices. Of course, there is also complete freedom of religion according to the Soviet constitution. But tell that to the clergy who want to build new churches, or educate seminarians, or speak freely from the pulpit.

The Reagan Administration made human rights a fundamental part of Untied States policy everywhere. We have made our standards clear not only to totalitarian regimes with Marxist governments, but to authoritarian regimes with military-dominated governments. Human rights have thereby become a major factor in our relations with all countries—friends and enemies, allies and antagonists alike.

The second American ideal that should inform our foreign policy is economic freedom. There is no country in the world that gives greater freedom to enterpreneurial talent, that gives workers more freedom to find the best use for their skills, and that gives the consumer a greater range of products and services than the United States.

It was not so long ago that arguments raged over the relative merits of capitalism and socialism. Many saw the future in statist solutions to economic problems. In the 1970's, Angola and Ethiopia joined the ranks of socialist countries, as did Vietnam, Cambodia and Laos.

Yet, just a decade later, many of those who thought that economic controls would bring economic growth have found that they have brought only economic decay. If there is any reason for a Soviet and Chinese about-face in economic thinking, it has nothing to do with a change of heart by Marxist theoreticians and everything to do with a simple observation that could be made by anyone forced to stand in line outside a state-owned grocery store: democratic capitaism has left Marxist planning in the dust.

Nowhere is that more apparent than in the two Koreas, where South Korea's per capita income has leaped from $96 in 1962 to more than $2,000 today, a figure three times the current per capita income of its once wealthier neighbor to the north.

What's true in the Pacific Rim is also true in Africa. About 30 years ago, the socialist leader of Ghana, Kwame Nkrumah, issued a challenge to the market-oriented leader of the Ivory Coast. He mentioned that their countries were neighbors and were very similar to each other in many respects but one: Ghana was following a socialist path; the Ivory Coast, a market path.

Mr. Nkrumah suggested they should compare each other's progress in future years. The results were striking: from 1960 to 1982, Ghana's per capita income fell 1.3 percent a year; in the Ivory Coast, it rose 2.1 percent a year.

It is clear that free enterprise has won the battle of the economic theories. And the main reason is the collapse of so many planned economies. This offers both an opportunity and a challenge to the United States. It's an opportunity to spread economic liberties to other countries and a challenge for us to help restore their economies.

However, those nations who are willing to accept our help should also be willing to adopt some economic reforms. For years, many developing nations have been very happy indeed to accept development assistance and loans from institutions like the World Bank and countries like the United States to support infrastructure projects like power facilities, new roads, and major agriculture and industrial schemes. But if they truly want faster growth they will have to more readily accept market-oriented reform—the only true reforms that will lead to real economic growth.

A third element should guide our foreign policy. It stems not from our ideals but from our need for security. Our foreign policy must reflect America's ideals, but it also must reflect global realities. We live in a dangerous world at a dangerous time. So we must pursue a foreign policy that not only projects human rights and economic liberties outside its borders, but also protects those same freedoms within its borders.

It has been roughly 175 years since the United States had to fight a foreign power on the continental United States. Our isolation came to an abrupt halt on December 7, 1941. America's reaction to the events of that day were best put by Senator Arthur Vandenburg, a great statesman from the state of Michigan and a man who had long been a principled isolationist. "My convictions regarding international cooperation and collective security for peace took firm form on the afternoon of the Pearl Harbor attack," he said. "That day ended isolationism for any realist."

That was in 1941. It then took the Japanese fleet 11 days to cross the Pacific to attack Pearl Harbor. Today it would take about 11 minutes for a submarine-launched Soviet warhead to reach Chicago. It is clear we must maintain a national defense second to none. Our survival, and the survival of the rest of the free world, depend on it.

Yet, there are some who challenge our defense establishment. They say that the United States is an imperialist nation. If it is, I have certainly seen no evidence of it.

I have been in Congress since 1957, and have served on the House Foreign affairs Committee since 1961, 14 of those years as Vice Chairman. I have now served with 8 Presidents and 10 Secretaries of State, as well as untold hundreds of assistant secretaries and foreign service officers. I have attended top secret meetings in The White House, the State Department, the Pentagon, and in Congress. And not once have I seen any evidence of grand conspiracies, of great global designs. I have just seen people who are intent on preserving our security and projecting our ideals.

For all of our global influence, we certainly have been a reluctant superpower. After World War II, when much of Europe lay in ashes, when Russia was exhausted from the loss of 20 million of her people, when Japan was occupied, we made no move to create a great American empire.

In fact, the first thing we did was to demobilize our armed forces. Like Cincinnatus, most American servicemen returned to the proverbial plow. In 1945, we had 12 million men and women in uniform. One year later, we had fewer than 3 million wearing a uniform. Is that the sign of an imperialist nation?

America must, and does, use its power prudently. Yet it should do everything it can to protect itself. Moreover, if our foreign policy is to be successful, we must not be afraid to project our ideals. And, if our ideals are to shine faith brightly to other nations, we must be willing to project our influence to make that happen. That is the role of being both a great and decent world power.

HYDRO MADNESS

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, the United States is slowly but surely losing some of its most pristine and wild rivers and streams to small hydroelectric power developments. While the loss of this rich river heritage alone should be a cause for concern, these projects are extracting a heavy toll on electric utility ratepayers. Ironically, this is occurring under the guise of a law which purported to have conservation and consumerism as its goals.

These hydroelectric power projects are being fostered and in fact, subsidized, under the Public Utility Regulatory Policies Act of 1978 [PURPA]. The intent of this law was to facilitate industrial cogeneration and environmentally benign alternative power sources by requiring electric utilities to purchase this power whenever it is offered.

While PURPA never intended a ratepayer subsidy, because of changing energy prices and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission's inept implementation of the law, that is exactly what has happened.

For example, I recently learned that if two proposed hydro projects at Summersville and Sutton in West Virginia are approved by FERC, the combined effect on electric utility consumers would be a $91 million subsidy financed by the ratepayers over a 10-year period.

This subsidy occurs as a result of the regulatory scheme for these projects. About $27 million of this amount is due to what represents an interest-free loan from the consumers to the developers on the $48 million differential between the cost of producing the hydro power over how much they would pay for coal-fired generation already in the system. Another $64 million accrues under the regulatory system in payments for capacity that is not currently needed. I might add that the efficacy of building hydroelectric power projects in the midst of some of the richest coalfields in the world is simply beyond the comprehension of this Member of Congress.

In addition, FERC unilaterally expanded PURPA's coverage as it relates to hydroelectric power to new dams rather than solely to existing sites as intended by Congress. The floodgates were opened and armed with this misinterpretation of the law and a hefty 21 percent tax credit, private developers found a sure fire way to profit from small hydroelectric power projects which would otherwise be uneconomical to construct and operate.

During the period 1984 to 1988 alone, 447 new projects primarily of 30 megawatts and less in size went on line. Last year, 165 additional hydro projects were under construction with 1,429 planned or projected. In addition, many of these projects serve no public need for additional electric generating capacity.

We are, as such, faced with the prospect of consumers continuing to be made to pay for projects that are not only unneeded, but for power that is more expensive than what is already being generated and planned for by the electric utility company.

To further aggravate the situation, we are losing the recreational and scenic values of our rivers. With the growing demand for outdoor recreational opportunities, we can ill-afford the continued loss of the natural resources on which hydroelectric power is based. Nor can many areas of the country afford to squander away its tourism potential for the sake of unnecessary hydro power developments.

This situation has not gone unnoticed by the Congress. The tax credits have been ended for new projects. The Electric Consumers Protection Act of 1987 also sought to place some checks on the development of hydro projects as it relates to the environment. Yet, there is evidence to suggest that once again the meaning and intent of the law is falling on deaf ears at FERC.

I would submit that to date, all of the hydroelectric projects that may have been needed, and that may have made sense, have already been built. What is left are marginal projects with geological, environmental and economic deficiencies.

Simply put, this hydropower madness must stop.

Today, I, along with the gentleman from California, RICK LEHMAN, are introducing a bill which would simply repeal PURPA as it applies to hydroelectric projects. This legislation would once and for all end the cruel hoax that is being perpetrated on the American people by speculators in hydroelectric power.

At this point, I think we should all "just say no to hydro."

EX-CUBAN PRISONER RECALLS ILL-TREATMENT

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I am submitting for the RECORD an article which appeared in the Washington Post on January 19, 1989. The article tells briefly the story of Mr. Jose L. Pujals, a political prisoner under Fidel Castro for nearly 30 years.

After speaking out against the Castro regime, Mr. Pujals was subjected to 27 years of prison, hard labor, and beatings. Thanks in part to a letter signed by Congressman FRANK WOLF, myself, an over 160 others. Mr. Pujals was finally released last fall.

I urge my colleagues to take a moment to read this short article.

EX-CUBAN PRISONER RECALLS ILL-TREATMENT

(Jack Anderson and Dale Van Atta)

Jose L. Pujals spent nearly half of his life wondering whether he would live to see the next day.

His antagonist was Fidel Castro, arguably the last of the charismatic communist dictators, who still believes he can turn his island nation into a people's republic of paradise. Castro clings to ideals that even the Soviet Union is rethinking and he has cruelly repressed his enemies.

Last year, Castro made a rare attempt to spruce up his international image. He released about 250 political prisoners who have been piling up in Cuban prisons in the 30 years since he seized power.

The gesture may put a temporary sheen on Castro, but people such as Jose Pujals are skeptical. Pujals, now 63, spent nearly three decades in Cuban prisons because he disagreed with Castro. The dictator's sweeping gesture set Pujals free two months ago, but that can't make up for the 27 years that Pujals says he was beaten and forced to work in fields.

"Day after day, you don't know when they're going to take your life away," he said. "When we went out to the fields, we didn't know if we would come back or be beaten to death."

Our associate Scott Sleek heard Pujals' first-hand account, which shows Castro's human rights record has plenty of room for improvement.

Pujals opposed dictator Fulgencio Batista, whom Castro overthrew in 1959. But he didn't trust Castro either. Pujals spoke out against the new revolutionary government and became a target for punishment. He was arrested in 1961 and charged with trying to kill Castro, with being a U.S. spy and other crimes. He admits that he tried to organize opposition to Castro's regime, but he says the other charges were bogus.

The government, according to Pujals, had decided his sentence before his trial. He lived for 14 months under the cloud of a death penalty. Today he says he thinks diplomatic appeals forced the government to lift the death sentence.

But that didn't end his suffering. He was transferred back and forth more than 20 times among eight prisons. He worked in fields or a stone quarry, where, he says, prisoners were beaten indiscriminately.

While common criminals wore blue prison garb, political prisoners were forced to wear the yellow uniforms of the Batista troops. Many of them hated Batista, but they came to see the yellow uniforms as a symbol of dignity. Then the prison officials decided that political prisoners should wear blue. Pujals said those who resisted were beaten. He and others were thrown into a tiny dungeon, where they wore only underwear and huddled together for warmth.

The political prisoners were frequently deprived of food, mail, visitors, light, water and medical care. The rules about mail taught them that no news was good news. "If a letter comes informing you of bad news about your family, they will hand it to you," Pujals said. "If it's good news, that your family is doing well . . . then they won't give it to you."

Pujals' wife, Gloria, sent their three children to be raised by relatives in Florida. She stayed in Cuba to be near him. He now lives in Tallahassee, Fla.

LOWER INCOME HOUSING FAIR RENT ACT OF 1989

HON. JACK BUECHNER

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. BUECHNER. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce the Lower Income Housing Fair Rent Act of 1989. My legislation modifies onerous income restrictions for Americans in public and assisted housing programs.

In plain language—this legislation eliminates artificial disincentives to economic advancement for families receiving public housing assistance. Under present regulations the entire income of lower income families is taken as the basis for the computation of housing assistance eligibility. Ostensibly designed to glean the chaff from the public housing roles, in fact, it creates a far greater problem.

According to the formula now used, families risk losing housing eligibility for, at best, marginal economic gains. We are in effect imposing regressive penalties on lower income families and by so doing perpetuating a dependent housing class. This is clearly wrong.

Young people cannot work to buy themselves clothes, or pay for their own lunches, or even save for their education. They cannot afford to bring home any income legally earned. To do so places them in jeopardy of losing the roof over their families head.

By penalizing young people who would secure legitimate employment in order to help support their family, we turn them to nefarious activities to acquire income. In the inner cities this means drugs. Clearly this was not the intent of the regulations as originally written.

My legislation excludes all income earned by family members—other than the two family members with the highest incomes—in determining eligibility. It eliminates restrictions on income earned by children and other family members.

I am not suggesting that we give people a free ride in public housing, nor does this legislation do so. Anyone familiar with public housing projects realize that few live there by choice. My legislation gives people a choice, or at least the opportunity to work to provide one for themselves.

THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY BANQUET LINCOLN REPUBLICAN CLUB OF OAKLAND COUNTY, MI

HON. WM. S. BROOMFIELD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I recently had the privilege of speaking at the 100th anniversary banquet of Michigan's Oakland County Lincoln Republican Club.

To the best of my knowledge, this is the longest continuous annual Lincoln Day dinner in America. I've been attending this dinner since 1948, when I was a young Michigan State Representative. The dinner was first held when Oakland County had only 41,000 people, before the Duryea brothers had built their first car, and when Henry Ford was just a 25-year-old, living on a farm in Dearborn, MI, selling firewood, and tinkering with machines.

I'd like to think of our club as a piece of American history—older than such other American institutions as the game of basketball, the movie industry or the automobile industry.

But I am sure that the 300 Republicans who gathered for the first banquet were not thinking about the future. Their thoughts must have been focused on the past, to a period 25 years before when a good number of them were fighting the battles of the Civil War.

This was the bloodiest war in American history. And what made it worse was that it pitted American against American.

It was not a popular war, and I think it says something about Lincoln's character and his dedication to principle that so many men who fought in that war held him in such reverence years later.

The Oakland County Lincoln Republican Club was created by members of the Grand Old Party, and its annual banquet has been maintained through the hard work of many Oakland County Republicans. But what brought all these people together 100 years ago, and what continues to draw them today, is not only party loyalty, but also a desire to commemorate the life and accomplishments of our greatest President, as well as his dedication to the principles on which the Republican Party was built.

The year the club was founded, Lincoln's great opponent, Jefferson Davis, died. With the passing of so many Civil War leaders, some people must have worried that the memories of a very important era in our history were growing dim.

I'd like to think that the same concerns were on the minds of those early Oakland County Republicans. They must have thought it important to remind the people of Oakland County that so many of their own people had fought with President Lincoln to preserve the Union and to ensure that all Americans could live free.

I believe my fellow Members would find it interesting to read a short history of the Oakland County Lincoln Republican Club and a list of the many fine Michiganders who have served it as president.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that these two documents be inserted in the RECORD.

HISTORY OF THE OAKLAND COUNTY LINCOLN REPUBLICAN CLUB

January 6, 1888 a group of Republicans met in the Club room of the Oakland Gazette, Pontiac, to take preliminary steps to form an Oakland County Republican Club. The meeting was called to order by C.F. Kimball. David Hobart of Holly was named chairman, and William H. Morgan of Pontiac secretary. Committees were appointed from each ward and township.

By-laws were drawn, and the Michigan Club of Oakland County was formed. They provided for an annual meeting to be held the second Saturday of February. Joseph E. Sawyer was elected president.

February 15, 1889, the club met, revised the by-laws and changed the name to the Oakland County Lincoln Republican Club. The Constitution and By-laws were incorporated, under the laws of the State of Michigan. Provision was made for the annual meeting to be held on Lincoln's birthday. C.F. Kimball was elected president.

The first annual banquet, held February 12, 1890 at the Opera House, Pontiac, was attended by several hundred persons, including Governor Cyrus G. Luce, legislators, and other prominent Republicans both in Michigan and other states. President Kimball called the assembly to order. He said he had no desire to detain them long from what they most yearned for, to partake of the feast prepared for the inner man, and the intellectual feast which was to follow. He addressed himself as follows to the object of the organization of the Oakland County Lincoln Republican Club: "The Lincoln Republican Club is composed of Republicans who dare to, and do, upon proper occasion, advocate, and sustain by their votes, always, the principles and organization of the Republican party." (Taken from the files of the Oakland Gazette, 1888-1889.)

Since 1889, only one year (1945—during World War II) has passed without a banquet being held.

In years past, the annual meeting and banquet was marked by an entire day of celebration; it meant the converging upon Pontiac from every section of the county of hundreds of loyal Republicans. Before the advent of the automobile, members came by horse and buggy and wagons. Special trains were operated on that day to transport Republicans from outlying areas of the county.

FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE REFORM ACT OF 1989

HON. DONALD J. PEASE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Federal Deposit Insurance Reform Act of 1989 which will limit Federal deposit insurance coverage on a $100,000 per person or total deposit basis.

The primary goal of deposit insurance is to promote financial stability through the prevention of widespread bank runs. Since its inception during the financially turbulent days of the Great Depression, our Federal deposit insurance system has performed well in achieving this end; however, any deposit insurance system entails with it unforeseen but very real costs, and the present U.S. system is certainly no exception.

Our current deposit insurance system is plagued with a host of costly disincentives and corresponding economic inefficiences which have generally arisen from the unlimited nature of our deposit insurance coverage. This system's limitless coverage stems from the fact that deposits are covered up to $100,000 on a per account basis. Individuals or corporations desiring coverage over the $100,000 limit can circumvent the per account limit by simply opening another account. The rise of brokered deposits has made this occurrence not only commonplace, but in many cases, very profitable. Why is such an insurance system prone to abuse and at the root of many of our depository institutions' problems? The thrift industry's current dilemma provides a vivid illustration.

The unlimited nature of deposit insurance coverage coupled with financial deregulation in the S&L industry produced an environment which encouraged risk taking and imprudent fiscal behavior. Many S&L's grew at astounding rates by offering high returns on accounts under the auspices of federally insured deposits. Brokered deposits, which split large sums of money into $100,000 bundles and channel these funds, risk free, into the highest yielding and oftentimes most reckless thrifts and banks, greatly facilitated this rapid growth. Additionally, S&L's were now investing in unfamiliar areas, forbidden prior to deregulation.

Yet even as these thrifts expanded at such dizzying speeds, depositors did not feel the need to monitor the financial health of their depository institutions because the Federal Government was guaranteeing their deposits. Released from depositor—and not to mention FSLIC—discipline and scrutiny, thrifts had a greater incentive to invest in riskier assets with higher yielding returns, and with their new found cash, that is exactly what they did. Predictably, many of these investments went sour, but the S&L saga did not end there; on the contrary, this was only the beginning.

As losses began to mount and numerous S&L's became insolvent, the FSLIC was overwhelmed and the net worth of its insurance fund rapidly declined, reaching negative reserves for the first time in 1986 and growing progressively more insolvent in the years following. Yet still, insolvent institutions were allowed and able to operate through the miracle of unlimited deposit insurance coverage. Although owner's equity in the insolvent institutions was gone, individual depositors and brokers continued to feed these institutions capital because they knew that their deposits were ultimately backed by the Federal Government and because many of the insolvent thrifts offered the highest rates of return.

This precarious hand to mouth financial existence encouraged thrift managers to engage in risky but potentially high yielding loans and investments. Such activities held out the minute possibility of restoring the institutions to positive net worth in the unlikely event of a financial success. On the other hand, in the event that these loans and investments failed, which many of them did, the loss would be absorbed by the Federal Government at no additional cost to the thrift managers or owners. Such gambling, ultimately at the American taxpayer's expense, was promulgated by our current deposit insurance system and substantially contributed to the exorbitant costs of the S&L bailout, for in the absence of deposit insurance coverage, many of these risky loans and investments would not have been made. Unfortunately, such activities persists today and are a major reason why the S&L bailout bill seems to rise exponentially on a monthly basis.

These perverse risk promoting incentives are the primary but not the only problems associated with our present deposit insurance system. The unlimited nature of insurance coverage also subsidizes safe, high returns for upper-income depositors, corporations, and banks and thrifts themselves who are the most avid users of brokered deposits. Furthermore, such extensive insurance coverage unnecessarily extends the Federal Government's financial liability. Today, the U.S. Government guarantees approximately $3 trillion in deposits—an astronomical and ever-growing figure, especially in light of our current fiscal and budgetary problems.

In light of these problems, a growing number of academics and policy makers have begun to realize that a significant change in our present deposit insurance system is needed. President Bush's S&L plan correctly calls for a thorough Treasury Department study of the present deposit insurance system, which is to focus on reforms that would limit insurance coverage and the use of brokered deposits.

The Federal Deposit Insurance Reform Act of 1989 is a structural reform which would limit deposit insurance on a $100,000 per person or total deposit basis. This would eradicate many of the current disincentives, costs, and inefficiencies which the present system encourages by placing financial risk back on the appropriate individuals—mainly, the owners and managers of the banks and thrifts and not on the American taxpayer. With such a reform in place, managers of depository institutions would certainly behave in a more prudent and responsible manner because deposit insurance, which presently renders the costs of funds unrealistically cheap, would guarantee a smaller percentage of their reserves. Furthermore, this bill would require depositors to monitor the health of the institutions in which they place their funds due to the fact that any amount of total savings exceeding $100,000 would no longer be guaranteed. Such depositor prudence, in turn, would certainly limit the rapid growth and continual operation of insolvent and unsound financial institutions because without a Government guarantee, even substantially higher interests rates would not allow these institutions to continually attract capital as they now do.

Depositor prudence, spurred by a $100,000 per person limit on insurance coverage could also transform the nature of the brokered deposit business. Instead of promoting instability, which some brokerage agencies do by chasing the highest rates at some of the most insolvent institutions, the role of the broker could potentially be the promotion of the most financially sound institutions for those individuals desiring to deposit funds in excess of the $100,000 insurable limit. In the absence of a Government guarantee, targeting sound institutions and not simply high rates of return would be an important aspect of the brokerage business.

Finally, the Federal Deposit Insurance Reform Act of 1989, which would be applied in a non-retroactive manner, would enhance financial stability. Bank runs would not result because deposits insured before the reform would keep their Government guaranteed status; yet, the risk promoting incentive structure inherent in our current deposit insurance system would be curtailed. Therefore, the likelihood of another fiscal fiasco anywhere near the size of the S&L debacle would be dramatically reduced. Furthermore, Government liability in the form of slower growth in insured deposits would also be significantly, yet gradually curtailed.

As mentioned at the onset, through prevention of bank runs, the ultimate goal of a deposit insurance system is to promote financial stability. Yet the current state of our system is beginning to represent a triumph of means over ends. The limitless nature of our deposit insurance coverage has precluded the advent of any major bank runs; however, in light of the hundreds and potentially thousands of insolvent thrifts and banks, a taxpayer bailout plan topping $100 billion, and the FDIC's first ever fiscal year loss in 1988, overall financial stability has certainly not been achieved. On the contrary, the United States has not witnessed such a broad and costly depository institution mess since the Great Depression. Structural changes are needed in our present deposit insurance system which will bring financial means back in line with the overall goal of financial stability. The Federal Deposit Insurance Reform Act of 1989 would be an important step in the direction of this goal. Without reforms along these lines, the trillion dollar taxpayer bailout of the FDIC in the year 2000 may make our current FSLIC problems and costs seem like a drop in the bucket.

HIGH DEFINITION TELEVISION [HDTV] COMPETITIVENESS ACT OF 1989

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, today, Congressman MEL LEVINE and I introduced the first legislation specifically designed to help American industry compete with Japanese and European companies in the development and manufacturing of high definition television [HDTV]. The Japanese and Europeans have a pronounced lead in the development of this important technology. The High Definition Television Competitiveness Act of 1989 will encourage American industry to get back into the consumer electronics field we all but abandoned over the last decade. And in doing so, we will be helping to retain our lead in advanced electronics and computers.

The two most important inventions of the 20th century are the automobile and the television. One gave mobility to people and the other gave mobility to ideas. HDTV is a radically improved version of TV technology that will change the way television is viewed and used. By itself and combined with computer technology, it can change the way we all live and work.

HDTV, the next generation of TV technology, will deliver both greatly enhanced picture resolution and CD-quality sound to this country's 90 million television households. In addition to better home entertainment, HDTV has many different commercial, educational, health and defense applications which will make it increasingly important to the economic well-being and security of the Nation.

The High Definition Television Competitiveness Act of 1989 is a multilevel approach to helping America catch up with and potentially lead the competition. First, the legislation would provide appropriate incentives in the Tax Code to stimulate HDTV research, development and pilot manufacturing by domestic industries. Next, it would change current antitrust laws to allow cooperative efforts and joint ventures by domestic companies to engage in HDTV-related research, development and manufacturing. The legislation would also encourage Government participation and shared funding to facilitate and coordinate joint ventures and cooperative industry efforts in HDTV development. It also instructs the Secretary of Commerce report to the President on the trade implications of HDTV and how we may use trade laws to promote U.S. HDTV production. In addition, the bill would increase funding to the FCC to speed the adoption of a transmission standard, an essential component of the rapid development of a HDTV manufacturing industry.

An important aspect of this legislation is it seeks to have a market for HDTV's before mass production is realized. The legislation has the Secretary of Commerce investigating the potential Government uses for this technology. The applications are many. We foresee agencies such as the Federal Aviation Administration, NASA, the Department of Defense, the Departments of Education and Agriculture as potential users of this technology. The legislation also calls for experimental community demonstration projects showing applications of HDTV technology in both homes and places of business.

If you share our desire to help America compete in this bellwether technology, we urge you to cosponsor this important legislation. Following is a section-by-section analysis of the High Definition Television Competitiveness Act of 1989:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

THE HIGH DEFINITION TELEVISION COMPETITIVENESS ACT OF 1989

Section 1. Short Title.—This section identifies the Act as the "High Definition Television Competitiveness Act of 1989".

LEGISLATION ESTABLISHING THE CALUMET NATIONAL HISTORICAL PARK

HON. ROBERT W. DAVIS

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducting legislation which will establish the Calumet National Historical Park in Michigan's Upper Peninsula. The Calumet areas holds a significant place in the history of America's copper mining industry. Now commonly called the "Copper Country," Calumet and nearby communities once supplied 75 percent of the Nation's copper.

The largest lava flow on earth is located on the Keweenaw Peninsula—Keweenaw, Houghton and Ontonagon Counties—in the Upper Peninsula of Michigan. This large sale volcanic activity produced the only place on Earth where economically recoverable 100 percent pure native copper is found. Some masses of pure copper exceeded 500 tons.

The Keweenaw Peninsula was the source of rich copper deposits which were mined by local Indians from the prehistoric times and until the early 1800's. The Keweenaw Peninsula is the only site in the country of aboriginal, prehistoric mining of copper. This copper was traded as currency in a wide area.

In the 1600's French explorers reported rich copper mines on the southern shore of Lake Superior. A British mining company explored for copper there in the 1770's. The first mining boom of the country occurred there after the discovery of the 3,708 pound solid copper Ontonagon Boulder and reaching a treaty with the Indians, about 5 years before the California gold rush.

From 1845 until the Civil War, 75 percent of the U.S. production of copper came from the Keweenaw Peninsula. This percentage dropped gradually to about 20 percent in 1885. At that time, this region in Michigan produced 12 percent of the world's copper. From 1885 to 1920, production increased greatly, but the percentage of the U.S. production gradually declined to about 10 percent.

During the U.S. Civil War, about 90 percent of the copper used came from the Keweenaw Peninsula—56 percent from the Quincy mine alone. Between 1840 and 1920, more than 400 companies were organized to mine copper in the Keweenaw copper range.

Mining on the Keweenaw Peninsula pioneered deep shaft mining techniques and advancements in related mining technology. For years both the deepest vertical shaft—over 6,000 feet—and incline shaft, over 9,000 feet—in the world were some new mines deeper. Some of the first large scale industrial organizations in the country were formed there.

Active mining on the Keweenaw Peninsula ceased in 1968 due to economic conditions. In 1989, due to the high price of copper, several groups are studying the possibility of reopening two of the Calumet and Hecla Mines that were closed in 1968. Huge amounts of copper remain here. As cheap sources of copper get mined out elsewhere in the world, mining will return to the Keweenaw Peninsula. It's just a matter of time.

Michigan Technological University in Houghton, MI, was established in 1885 to support the local mining industry. The university has the records of the Calumet and Hecla Mining Co., the Quincy Mining Co. and many other important records and photographs preserved in the university archives and the Copper Country Historical Collections.

Geologic records have been preserved by Michigan Technological University at the A.E. Seaman Mineralogical Museum. The museum has over 60,000 mineral specimens—the core of the collection documents the Keweenaw Copper Range. Local mineral specimens have been traded with mineral museums around the world to establish one of the finest mineral collections in the world.

Michigan Technological University also has a faculty well versed on mining in the Keweenaw Peninsula in their geology, mining and metallurgy engineering departments and in social sciences.

Currently there are historic remnants located in and in the vicinity of Calumet, MI. These remnants tell the story of the mines, machinery and technology that gave rise to the growth and development of the copper industry from its earliest years through 1920.

As is evident from this information, the Calumet area represents an unsurpassed chapter in our Nation's copper mining history. It is for this reason that I am introducing legislation to establish the Calumet National Historical Park. The park will illustrate the historical importance of the Keweenaw Peninsula in the development of our Nation's technology.

TOBACCO EXPORT REFORM ACT

HON. CHESTER G. ATKINS

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring to the attention of the American people legislation introduced by Congressman LEVINE, myself, Congressman WHITTAKER and Congressman WAXMAN entitled the Tobacco Export Reform Act.

It seems hard to believe, but the U.S. Government, which banned cigarette advertisements on TV, required warning labels on packages, banned smoking on most airline flights, and declared through the Surgeon General that tobacco is an addictive drug, is aggressively promoting tobacco use in other countries. The Tobacco Export Reform Act will curtail the export of tobacco products by prohibiting the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative from threatening economic sanctions against countries that do not open their tobacco markets. In addition, the bill requires all exported cigarettes with U.S. brand names to carry the Surgeon General's warning.

The consequences of U.S. actions on behalf of the tobacco industry have serious ramifications for our future trade policy, health policy, and foreign policy. The United States is not only perpetrating an extraordinary expensive and ultimately lethal health risk abroad, it is expending valuable political capital to open foreign markets that benefit multinational firms but not the interests of America or the world.

Officials at the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative argue that breaking down tobacco trade barriers in Asia will help to liberalize markets for other U.S. products. However, all evidence indicates that the opposite is true. In 1986 the USTR announced a landmark agreement with Korea on tobacco while reporting little progress on 54 other agricultural exports. Gains by the tobacco industry have been offset by setbacks with beef, wheat, high technology, leather, and other products.

On moral grounds, the actions of the U.S. Government are not lost on foreign leaders and citizens. The tobacco trade conjures up the worst images of the ugly American and foreign policy bully. Recently, there have been anti-American demonstrations over tobacco in South Korea and Taiwan. It is reminiscent of the Opium Wars of the 1840's, when the British fought for the right to export opium to China.

Today, countries that resist reducing tobacco export tariffs are threatened with an equally blunt instrument—economic sanctions. Attempts by Korea, Taiwan, and Japan to ban cigarette advertising from television was met with criticism from the United States, which considers a ban on advertising abroad an unfair trade practice but which considers a ban on TV advertising at home a national health priority.

It is both unfortunate and short sighted that America's commitment to public health extends only to our water's edge. While public health awareness has led a 1.1 percent annual decline in cigarette consumption in Europe and America, aggressive marketing has led to a 2.1 percent yearly increase in Asia and the developing world.

In Asia much of the increase has come from U.S. tobacco company efforts to increase cigarette demand among women and children—two groups who do not traditionally smoke. They are succeeding. As a result of Madison Avenue style promotional strategies, female college students in Japan are four times as likely to smoke as their mothers.

Furthermore, the tobacco trade is of dubious value to the American farmer. Most exported cigarettes with American brand names are grown with foreign leaf and processed on foreign soil. Shortly, a joint venture between the People's Republic of China and R.J. Reynolds will produce billions of cigarettes. This new factory will be the most modern cigarette factory in Asia. While multinational corporations reap the rewards of increased foreign cigarette consumption, it is apparent that American farmers are left out of the profit equation.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that most Americans would be outraged to learn that U.S. cigarette packages require no warning label when exported to many countries—or to learn that exported cigarettes with American brand names contain mostly foreign grown tobacco. It is no wonder that Asian citizens are outraged at the United States. Our trade policy, which is achieved through intense negotiations and pressure, sends a message to our trade partners that Asian lungs are more expendable than American lungs.

Our bill will ensure that the United States has a trade policy that we can all be proud of. The time is right for Congress, the health community and all Americans to demand that our Government play fair with our allies and trading partners. Thanks in large part to actions by the U.S. Government, pandemic lung cancer in Asia is not just likely, it is inevitable. The Tobacco Export Reform Act is an important step for world public health and for a trade policy that makes sense.

ESTONIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. JOHN MILLER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, last Friday was the 71st anniversary of Estonia's Declaration of Independence. My district has been fortunate the last few weeks to have a group of Estonian students participate in an exchange program. These Estonian students who are attending Mariner High School, have brought home to us once again the truth that Estonians are their own people with their own culture. They are not Russians, they are Estonians, and the Estonian people have the right to self-determination. Later this month a group of Mariner High School students will be visiting Estonia, and will see this first hand themselves.

Once again, this year, the bravery and courage of the Estonian people has been on evidence for all the world to see, admire, and emulate. In response to the small openings of glasnost, the Estonian people themselves demanded reform, democracy, and outright independence. Last September 17, one-third of the entire population of Estonia attended a rally, and 900,000 signed a petition opposing proposed Soviet constitutional changes as undemocratic and harmful to Estonian interests. To put this in perspective, a proportional rally in the United States would require some 83 million people to participate.

On our country's Independence Day, we can freely celebrate and enjoy the freedom and liberty that democracy brings to the people. But Estonians today gather at their own peril to remember the independence which was taken away from them.

Just this week in Lithuania a leading Communist Party official criticized that Baltic Republic's largest grassroots reform movement, and recommended a tightening of government control of publications. The Estonians who gathered on February 24 for Estonian Independence Day know full well that in Estonia, today's freedom can vanish at an official's whim.

And yet Estonians continue the struggle for their freedom. They yearn once again to control their own destiny. They understand that only when Estonians can decide their own internal affairs will economic, environmental, and other concerns be solved. The Estonian National Independence Party declared:

We do not have enough clean air, water or earth to sustain life, let alone freedom.

And so, as in America, but without the protection of America's freedom, Estonians have courageously worked at the grassroots to gain back their freedom.

Estonians do not forget the freedom that was taken from them by the Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact. We, in Congress and around the country, must also not forget the plight of the Estonians. We will continue to work for the day when once again Estonia will be an independent and free country.

PIK CERTIFICATES

HON. JIM JONTZ

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. JONTZ. Mr. Speaker, today my colleague from Illinois, Mr. EVANS, and I are introducing legislation to correct a problem which many farmers and agribusinesses are experiencing with the U.S. Department of Agriculture's [USDA] payment-in-kind certificates [PIK].

Specifically, this legislation would address the problem created by the refusal of USDA to allow subsequent holders of PIK certificates to redeem these certificates in the same manner as presently allowed by original owners.

Generic PIK certificates have been used since 1983 by USDA, in lieu of cash, to pay producers for participating in USDA farm programs. These certificates can be redeemed for commodities or cash, can be used to pay off an existing commodity loan, or can be sold by the original owner depending on what works best in his/her farming operation. However, the certificates do have an expiration date, which has created confusion and problems for some farmers.

Low commodity prices over the past few years have increased farmer participation in Government farm programs designed to reduce the amount of surplus farm commodities. Many farmers who had never participated before did so, and were unaware of the complex and often confusing program requirements, deadlines, and expiration dates.

As a result of this confusion and unfamiliarity many producers were not aware of the expiration dates of PIK certificates. When several farmers ended up with expired certificates, USDA initiated a plan to allow original owners to redeem expired certificates for 85 percent of their face value. However, USDA did not address the problem of expired certificates held by subsequent owners.

It is important that USDA treat subsequent holders of PIK certificates in the same manner as original owners, by allowing redemption of expired certificates at 85 percent of their face value. Subsequent holders generally purchase PIK certificates, sometimes even at a premium, to be able to take advantage of favorable conditions to market their gain. Such purchases help free up available Government owned stocks of grain by enabling farmers to pay off existing farm stored commodity loans and thereby allowing the movement of the grain into the open market.

The reasons these certificates expire are numerous, and the following are some problems experienced by a few of my constituents: First, a producer bought several certificates at one time thinking the expiration dates were all the same only to find out some had already expired or were about to; second, a producer signed over his certificates to his bank as collateral for a loan, the bank took possession of the certificates, and notified him the day they were to expire that he had better do something with them. He did and found that he had approximately 5 hours to sell them or they would expire leaving him holding worthless certificates as he no longer was the original holder because he had signed them over to the bank; third, a grain elevator whose normal practice is to place newly purchased PIK certificates on top of the company safe, until they can be put in the safe at the end of the day. Several weeks later the grain elevator's bookkeeper discovered that some PIK certificates were missing. Fortunately the PIK certificates were found behind the safe, but unfortunately they had expired.

These are just some of the examples of what can happen, and some good reasons for changing the present policy. The amount of financial loss to farmers varies, from a few hundred to several thousand dollars. These people aren't asking to redeem their expired certificates at full face value, they are just asking for the same treatment given to original owners whose certificates also expired.

The legislation that my friend and colleague from Illinois, Mr. EVANS, and I are introducing will correct this inequity, by requiring USDA to redeem expired PIK certificates held by subsequent owners. We welcome your cosponsorship and support.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO ENSURE PROPER SAFEGUARDS FOR RURAL TELEPHONE RATEPAYERS

HON. JIM COOPER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, today I am reintroducing legislation I sponsored last year—H.R. 5019—to protect rural telephone users from FCC actions that threaten to allow their long-distance bills to rise. Last year, over 80 of my colleagues joined me as cosponsors, and I invite their support again today.

AT&T now averages its long-distance rates so that all calls of equal distance are priced the same, no matter whether the call is made to a city or to the country—even though it costs much more to make a rural long-distance call. This averaging involves cost-sharing among all local and long-distance companies. It is justified by Federal law requiring universal nationwide phone service at just and reasonable rates. If rates are deaveraged in any way, it is likely that rural America will bear the brunt of higher rates.

Under an order the FCC intends to adopt in 2 weeks, the telephone giants like AT&T could legally raise some rates by 5 percent a year while dropping other rates. Consider this: Services used mostly by rural ratepayers could go up legally by 20 percent over the 4-year plan as services used mostly by city folks go down by 20 percent.

The FCC's plan is to start a new system of telephone regulation for AT&T and the local Bell companies called price caps. It is very different than traditional rate of return regulation. It helps the telephone giants respond better to competition in cities, primarily. But it also allows them to increase prices where they face no competition. This scares many rural phone companies, and rightly so.

In 1987, the National Telephone Cooperative Association [NTCA] raised concerns that the FCC was neglecting rural safeguards. They filed comments with the FCC asking for specific protections for rate averaging, cost-sharing, and a unified industry rate of return. But the FCC failed to include these specific safeguards in either of the proposals it offered for public notice and comment.

In repeated appearances before the House Telecommunications Subcommittee, FCC Chairman Dennis Patrick offered verbal commitments to continue long-distance rate averaging, and last week he announced his plans to some sort of policy statement in the final order to that end. But this week, Chairman Patrick refused to agree to adopt firm, explicit rules in the order to guarantee the continuance of nationwide long-distance rate averaging and pooling. If the specifics in the proposal make subtle rate deaveraging legal, then his general policy statement is of little value.

So I wouldn't try to take his guarantee to the bank. Rural America deserves a full range of explicit rate safeguards, and any form of regulation without such rules should be defeated.

This bill would require rules to ensure the continuance of long-distance rate averaging and pooling. Most importantly, it would give the Congress time to inspect and evaluate whether the FCC has adequately provided for these safeguards before any price caps plan goes into effect. Last Thursday, NTCA passed a resolution calling for Congress to ensure that all of these concerns are completely resolved.

I thank all of my colleagues who join with me in introducing this legislation. It is critical that we send a stern signal to the FCC immediately that we will not allow rural America's rates to increase unfairly.

COMMEMORATIVE COINS HONORING THE BICENTENNIAL OF THE U.S. CONGRESS

HON. DANTE B. FASCELL

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in honor of the "Bicentennial of the Congress of the United States of America." On March 4, 1789, 13 of the 65 Members of the newly elected U.S. House of Representatives met for the first time in New York City in Federal Hall, on the corner of Broad and Wall Streets. While it would take another month before the House achieved its first quorum, the gathering of these 13 Americans represents the beginnings of what has perhaps become the world's greatest experiment in government.

This year, to mark the achievements and accomplishments of the legislative branch of the Federal Government, a series of events will be held in honor of its bicentenary. Some of these events have already been held, while many others are yet to take place. One aspect of this celebration which I would like to mention is the minting of three commemorative coins in honor of the "Bicentennial of the U.S. Congress." These coins will honor the House of Representatives and the Senate and the principle they represent, Government for, and by, the people. I am particularly pleased that the spirit which launched our experiment in Government 200 years ago will be captured by these commemorative coins.

Mr. Speaker, the three-coin set will consist of a $5 gold coin, a $1 silver coin, and a half-dollar clad coin. As the sponsor of the legislation to mint these coins, I take great pride in advising our colleagues that the designs for these coins have been selected by the Secretary of the Treasury. The next step in the process is for the designs to be molded into casts for the actual striking of the coins, and a "first strike" ceremony is expected to take place this May. As a Member of Congress, it is with great anticipation that I await the day when these designs are transformed into coins, a tangible symbol of our bicentennial.

NATIONAL FHA/HERO WEEK

HON. WILLIAM H. NATCHER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. NATCHER. Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to once again recognize the members of the Future Homemakers of America as they recently celebrated FHA/HERO Week with the theme "Future Homemakers of America: Tomorrow's Leaders Today."

In 1988 Future Homemakers of America continued to be involved with family, community, and career activities. Chapter projects across the country focused on such topics as substance abuse, AIDS prevention, teenage pregnancy and parenting, working with children and the elderly, and developing leadership skills on the job.

In 1987–88 there were 10,927 members in 271 chapters in my home State of Kentucky. And in the Second Congressional District of Kentucky, which I have the privilege of representing in the Congress, there were 1,350 members.

Chapter projects in Kentucky continued to focus on issues that deal with teens and families, such as AIDS prevention, prevention of family violence, peer pressure, handicap awareness, child emotional abuse, stress management, and teen runaways.

Kentucky was the host State of a cluster meeting in November 1988; 2,414 students and 709 adults attended this meeting, which was the largest attendance ever at a regional meeting; 1,208 members and advisers attended the State meeting in Louisville and 175 members and advisers from Kentucky attended the 1988 National Leadership Conference in Cincinnati In July.

The national vice president of Future Homemakers of America is Beth Ann Campbell of Wallingford, KY, and I am especially pleased that the president and secretary of the Kentucky association are from the Second Congressional District. B.J. Devore, president, attends Caverna High School and Kim Brown, State secretary, attends West Hardin High School.

Deana Durham, a graduate of LaRue County High School, and the 1987–88 State president, was the recipient of the $2,000 Raye Virginia Allen State President's Scholarship, which recognizes leadership, academic excellence, and voluntarism.

The Future Homemakers of America is an excellent organization. I again want to commend the members and advisers for their continued commitment to community service, and I wish them continued success in their future endeavors.

A TRIBUTE TO ARTHUR P. TOWNSEND: A TRUE PUBLIC SERVANT

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I stand before you today to pay tribute to an outstanding resident of my district, Arthur P. Townsend. I am sorry to inform you that he passed away on Monday, February 13, 1989. This will be a terrible loss for San Bernardino, CA. Mr. Townsend was a vital, active participant in a wide range of organizations that have worked to strengthen the community. His many contributions will not be forgotten by the residents of the Inland Empire.

Moving to San Bernardino in 1945, Mr. Townsend became a community leader and a well-respected civil rights activist, acting as the voice of the African-American community in the Inland Empire. He was actively involved with the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People [NAACP] and was a charter member of the Congress of Racial Equality. Mr. Townsend founded and served as the chairman of the Inland Empire Black Caucus.

Art Townsend, also known as the Father of the Sixth Ward, worked to ensure political representation for the black residents of San Bernardino in the last 1960's. San Bernardino was divided into five city council wards at the time. Many of the city's black residents lived in the fifth ward, where their political power was limited. Largely due to efforts led by Mr. Townsend, the city charter was amended in 1967 to establish a sixth ward, guaranteeing black residents political representation in the San Bernardino city council.

Mr. Townsend was well-respected for his outstanding journalistic activities. In 1965, he established the Precinct Reporter, a weekly newspaper that is widely read throughout the Inland Empire. The Precinct Reporter has served to unify and stablilize local black communities during a period of social change. This newspaper is nationally recognized, and has been previously cited in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Mr. Townsend also served as the publisher of the only black-oriented weekly newspaper in the Orange County area—the Tri-County Bulletin. As a founding member of the West Coast Black Publishers Association, and a recent president, he was elected Publisher of the Year by that organization. He was also a member of the National Newspaper Publisher's Association. His solid reputation among professionals in the newspaper business attests to his success. His entrepreneurial skills in real estate enable him to subsidize his newspaper's organizations until the early 1980's, when the newspaper began to break even.

In a life marked by public service, Art Townsend served the community in many capacities. He was the Commander of American Legion Post 710, a charter member of the San Bernardino Juvenile Commission, a member of the San Bernardino Chamber of Commerce, and the founder of the San Bernardino Boys' Club. Mr. Townsend was also an ardent supporter of the League of Mothers.

Mr. Townsend's energy was not focused solely on local interests. Largely due to Mr. Townsend's efforts, San Bernardino became a sister city of Ife Ife, Nigeria. Nigerian royalty and high government officials have visited San Bernardino for meetings. Relationships such as these benefit all who are involved.

Art Townsend was as devoted to his family as he was to the community. He is survived by his wife, Mary, two daughters, Roslyn and Yolanda, and four sons, Brian, Michael, Gregory, and Donald. He instilled in his children his strong dedication to the community and civic affairs. I am pleased that his son Brian continues to publish the Precinct Reporter every Thursday, thus continuing the spirit of his father's efforts to create a better world.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that Arthur Townsend's leadership serves as a fine example for all public servants. As a leader, founder, and an active participant in many community activities in the Inland Empire, he will be sorely missed. His accomplishments have made the community of San Bernardino a better place to live, and his efforts will not be forgotten. I will certainly not forget him, for he was a good friend.

THE INTRODUCTION OF THE CARIBBEAN BASIN ECONOMIC RECOVERY EXPANSION ACT

HON. FRANK J. GUARINI

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. GUARINI Mr. Speaker, today we are taking a bold step for the future of peace and democracy in the Western Hemisphere. The 23 nations in the Caribbean Basin desperately need our help. In many areas, poverty, civil unrest, and instability threaten the very fabric of democracy.

The legislation we are introducing today strikes at the heart of the region's problems. CBI II is a strategy for restoring economic health to the Caribbean Basin. It is designed to increase trade and investment, expand employment opportunities, and foster long-term economic growth.

CBI II is not a new program. It is a better one. It builds upon the seeds of economic growth we planted in 1983. It builds on the region's strengths and targets those areas where CBI nations can truly compete.

For CBI sugar, it sets a minimum quota level at 1989 levels. For textiles and apparel, it removes duties on products made from U.S. parts. For tourism, it establishes a preclearance program and increases the duty-free allowance for U.S. travelers to the region. Moreover, it insulates CBI products from unintended consequences of trade actions and it makes the CBI a permanent program.

CBI II is mutually beneficial for the basin and the United States. In terms of our trade concerns, and national security, through CBI we strengthen each other and our future.

As CBI economies grow, U.S. exports to the region increase. That means more jobs in the basin and the United States Communications, transportation, textiles, and electronics are only a few of the industries that will benefit.

The prospects for CBI II are extremely good. There is growing bipartisan support in Congress. More and more people are putting parochial interests aside and recognizing the importance of long-term economic growth for the peace of the entire Western Hemisphere.

Economic stability and peace go hand in hand. One cannot proceed successfully without the other. Our efforts today will yield great rewards in terms of future national security and the security of the entire Western Hemisphere. Let us hope that the entire Congress and our President will join in our effort to bring a higher standard of living and a higher quality of life to all of the democracies of the free world.

REPEAL THE RESTRICTIONS ON IRA DEDUCTIONS

HON. ROBIN TALLON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. TALLON. Mr. Speaker, of the many challenges facing this country, none is more important than adopting fiscal policies that help America compete at home and abroad. The future of our country will be fought on the economic battlefield. And, it has become increasingly clear that the decline of the national savings rate is our Achilles heel.

The problem of low national saving has worsened significantly in the 1980's. National saving in 1986 and 1987 was approximately 2 percent of the GNP, a rate far to low to support domestic investment requirements. It is less than one-half of the saving rate of Great Britain, one-fifth the average saving rate of the major industrialized countries, and ⅛ the saving rate of Japan.

We simply must reduce the cost of capital in this country relative to our trading partners. I believe the place to start is by expanding the tax incentives for savings, rather than reducing or eliminating them as was done by the Tax Reform Act.

The structure of the Tax Code influences individual and corporate decisions to spend, save, and invest. Unfortunately, the structure of our current tax system encourages a lot more spending than saving and investing.

In particular, the new IRA restrictions that were enacted as part of the Tax Reform Act came at an unfortunate time. IRA's are about the only base of support for savings in this country. And with the increasing strains on the Social Security system, working Americans will become even more dependent on IRA's for their financial security upon retirement.

Instead of reducing IRA eligibility, I believe we should have extended full eligibility to all Americans. As a result, I have introduced H.R. 1273 to repeal the restrictions on IRA deductions added by the Tax Reform Act of 1986. My bill will restore the $2,000 deductibility on IRA deposits provided to all workers prior to 1986.

The restrictions placed on individual retirement accounts by the 1986 Tax Reform Act strike at the heart of middle-income families who are trying to earn a decent living, educate their children, and save for their retirement years. We cannot afford for them to stand.

Participation in IRA's jumped dramatically in 1982 following the Economic Recovery Act of 1981, which extended eligibility for tax-deferred IRA contributions to all earners. The number of contributors in 1982 was almost four times the 1981 number, from $26 billion to $250 billion. After the Tax Reform Act of 1986 narrowed eligibility for tax deferral, 1987 participation fell to less than half of that for 1985 and 1986.

Until the 1986 changes, the IRA was the best available savings program for the middle-class, working individuals of this country. Roughly 80 percent of those who have IRA's have incomes of $50,000 or less; 65 percent have incomes of $40,000 or less. With such statistics, it is difficult for me to understand how this savings program could ever be misapprehended as a rich person's tax break.

Mr. Speaker, every act of investment in the economy ultimately traces back to an act of saving. In turn, the surest way to raise our rate of economic growth and therefore our future standard of living is to increase the size of our capital stock. Taking a step toward increased savings through increased use of the IRA now will be well repaid with a stronger securer economic future for us all.

A CONGRESSIONAL SALUTE TO M. LUCILLE DRESSEL

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to an outstanding individual without whose help, I might not be standing before you today. M. Lucille Dressel will be honored by the Democratic Women's Study Club of Long Beach as their Woman of the Year on Friday, March 3, 1989. This occasion gives me the opportunity to express my sincere appreciation for her many years of hard work and unending commitment to the Long Beach community and the Democratic Party.

Lucille Dressel was born in Kaufman County, TX, on April 1, 1917. At age 7, she moved to Okarche, OK, a small town of 500 people, and attended public school and Congregational Church. It was in Oklahoma where she raised her daughter, Shirley Jenkins, now living in Long Beach, and her son, Jim Frederick, who now lives in San Francisco. After leaving Oklahoma in 1954, and spending many years in Colorado, Mrs. Dressel moved to Long Beach 10 years ago last June.

Mr. Speaker, Lucille Dressel has spent a great deal of her time advancing the beliefs of our Nation, its people, and the Democratic Party. For example, she has spent many enduring hours working with the GLENN M. ANDERSON congressional campaign, to which I am eternally grateful and indebted. She also helped in electing my step-son, Evan Anderson Braude, as councilman for the first district, Long Beach. Aside from her endeavors for me personally, she also helped with the Alex Pope campaign for Los Angeles County Supervisor, and assisted in Dave Elders' successful campaign for State assemblyman. On the national level she volunteered for Senator Gary Hart, Vice President Walter Mondale, Congresswoman Geraldine Ferraro, and for Massachusetts Gov. Michael Dukakis in 1988.

One would think that Mrs. Dressel's membership in the Democratic Club of Long Beach, and the Democratic Women's Study Club, along with her extensive political campaign work would leave her no time for civic and religious involvement. However, this is clearly not the case. She is a member of the Bixby Knolls Christian Church, the Interfaith Action for Aging, the Gray Panthers, the VFW Auxiliary, the American Legion Auxiliary, and the Long Beach Area Citizens Involved.

Mr. Speaker, M. Lucille Dressel commands the respect of the Long Beach community, the Democratic Party, and the entire Nation. My wife, Lee, joins me in extending our congratulations to this giving and unselfish woman. She is truly a remarkable individual who has devoted her talents and energies to enriching the lives of so many other people. We wish Lucille, her daughter, Shirley, and her son, Frederick, all the best in the years to come.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES LOCALITY PAY

HON. DEAN A. GALLO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to require that the Office of Personnel Management include high cost-of-living areas of northern and central New Jersey within its "Study of Federal Employees Locality Pay."

In areas such as northern and central New Jersey the Federal Government is finding it increasingly difficult to recruit and to retain its work force, demonstrating that the current practice of paying Federal employees the same rate throughout the country should be modified. Supporters of locality pay correctly argue that Federal salaries should reflect cost-of-living differentials across geographical regions.

Realizing the importance of the problem, OPM is conducting a study to determine the merits of locality pay. However, it is my understanding that OPM does not intend to include northern and central New Jersey. I strongly believe that this omission is unacceptable.

According to a report issued by the Metropolitan Northern New Jersey Federal Executive Board last year, the cost of living in northern and central New Jersey ranks among the highest in the Nation. For example, the median cost of a house in New Jersey is approximately $100,000 higher than the national average. Additionally, property taxes are 147 percent higher.

The Executive Board Report of August 1988, clearly shows that the Federal workforce is suffering from an increasing brain drain, as current Federal workers and highly qualified college graduates find that they can make substantially more money in the private sector.

Three examples demonstrate that the problem has already become a crisis for New Jersey. First, the August report states that New Jersey's Social Security Administration was unable to fill more than half its professional interviewing vacancies in 1987 despite extensive recruitment. Second, according to the Newark Star-Ledger, the inability to recruit accountants at New Jersey's IRS centers will cause tax assessments this year to be $20 million less than projected.

Third, virtually all of the agents in the entire New Jersey office of the Federal Bureau of Investigation are trying to transfer to New York. Why? Because FBI agents in New York were given 25 percent pay increases under a pilot program to test the effectiveness of locality pay.

Approximately 600,000 new Federal jobs in New Jersey will need to be filled with quality applicants by the year 2000.

Unless Federal compensation becomes more competitive with the private sector, I predict that the gap between job openings and qualified applicants will continue to widen.

It is my understanding that the OPM study will be influential in determining how Congress will address locality pay. I believe strongly that the study must examine the situation in northern and central New Jersey if its results are to be a fair presentation of this problem.

The issue of locality pay should be addressed in a comprehensive manner. In this bill, I am not asking for special treatment for New Jersey. I am only saying that New Jersey should be part of the solution.

I ask my fellow colleagues to join me in support of this legislation to ensure that the OPM study is truly useful.

FLORIO HONORS DR. HAROLD A. MILLER

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I take this opportunity to bring to the attention of my colleagues an educator who, after 30 years of community service, retired as principal of the Cinnaminson Middle School on August 31, 1988. I am referring to my constituent, Dr. Harold A. Miller, of the First Congressional District in New Jersey.

Dr. Miller began his career in education in 1950 with the Camden Board of Education until joining the Cinnaminson school system in 1955. Proving himself as a motivated teacher and competent administrator, Dr. Miller became vice principal of the junior-senior high school in 1964 and principal of the middle school in 1969. Throughout this time, he pursued his masters degree in education and administration and obtained a doctorate of education from Temple University in 1972. It is, therefore, evident that his commitment to the benefits of a full education were proven not only by his words, but by his deeds as well.

The attainment of the best education for the students was consistently an objective of Dr. Miller. Through his membership with the National, New Jersey, and Burlington County Education Associations, Dr. Miller constantly strived to discover the most improved curriculum and advanced educational techniques. It is by no accident that the superior education received by many of the students within the Cinnaminson district came about under the stewardship of Dr. Miller.

Mr. Speaker, on March 8, 1989, Dr. Miller will be honored by the community he served so well for his many years of dedication and service. Please join me in saluting Dr. Miller and wishing him much success and happiness in the many years to come.

THE EASTERN AIRLINES STRIKE

HON. THOMAS M. FOGLIETTA

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak about the rapidly approaching possibility of machinists' union strike at Eastern Airlines. This action would pose another threat to the stability of our Nation's airline industry and the daily schedules of air passengers nationwide. It also further weakens the public's wary confidence in the safety of air travel. Most importantly, it threatens the livelihoods of thousands of workers and their families.

In order to resolve this crisis rationally and fairly for all parties involved, I urge President Bush to immediately create an emergency mediation board and declare a 60-day moratorium on any action by either management or the labor unions that would disrupt or halt Eastern's regular schedule of airline service.

Labor-management relations at Eastern have been severely tested for the past 17 months, and the 30-day cooling-off period imposed by the National Mediation Board has failed to resolve their dispute. That period ends on March 4, allowing the airline to impose new working conditions and wages on the union, and freeing the union to go on strike.

Passengers and travel agencies are understandably reluctant to rely on Eastern's service and the airline continues to lose money at a rate of $1 million a day. While the machinists' union and management are far apart on contract terms, both parties want to keep the airline in business. Bankruptcy would mean not only the loss of jobs, but also the inevitable reduction of price competiton in today's regulated airline industry.

Rather than allowing further tension and increased bitterness on both sides, the President should appoint a factfinding panel and delay any strike for another 60 days. In making this request, I am joining the mediators who have been involved in recent negotiations.

The President is in a position to prevent service disruption throughout the airline industry. I urge him to use his executive authority and leadership ability to take these steps which are necessary to the survival of Eastern Airlines, the livelihood of its employees, and the protection of air travelers.

THE INCREASING IMPORTANCE OF THE ASIA-PACIFIC REGION

HON. ENI F.H. FALEOMAVAEGA

OF AMERICAN SAMOA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. FALEOMAVAEGA. Mr. Speaker, it is on the heels of President Bush's return from his tour of Asia that I would like to take a moment to note the rising influence and increasing impact of the Pacific region on international matters. Symbolically, unlike predecessors in the Office of the Chief Executive, President Bush's first major trip abroad has been to the countries of the Pacific rather than to those of the Atlantic.

In the upcoming decade and into the next century, the countries of the Pacific shall play a greater role in the economic, political, and military affairs of the United States and the world. As has been often stated, the 21st century shall truly be an era marked with significant economic advancement by the nations of the Pacific. According to administration sources, it is to be expected by 1995 that the United States' volume of Pacific-bound trade shall be twice that conducted with the nations of the Atlantic. Moreover, it is projected that the aggregate gross national product of the Pacific shall surpass that of Europe in a little over 10 year's time.

With Japan leading the way for the countries of the Pacific—being the world's greatest creditor Nation, its largest donor of foreign assistance and the United States strongest financial partner and ally in the defense of the sea lanes of the Pacific basin—the United States must reassess its relationship to the Asia-Pacific region. The United States clearly cannot be satisfied with merely maintaining its present policies when dealing with the Pacific. This is a time that mandates significant changes be made for the creation of alliances with the nations of the Pacific region that will protect our mutual interests and foster lasting trust.

It is gratifying to note that President Bush has recognized the need for change in the United States relationship with the countries of the Pacific. As the President has declared, America, too, is a Pacific nation and we must renew our determination to strengthen ties and relationships with our allies and partners in the Pacific region.

On that note, Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert in the RECORD two articles on this subject that have appeared recently in the press. The first article, entitled "Bush Restates U.S. Determination To Remain a Power in the Pacific," was written by Gerald M. Boyd, and published on February 23, 1989, by the New York Times. The second, entitled "Relearning From Japan," was written by Haynes Johnson and printed on February 24, 1989, by the Washington Post.

[From the New York Times, Feb. 23, 1989]

BUSH RESTATES U.S. DETERMINATION TO REMAIN A POWER IN THE PACIFIC

(By Gerald M. Boyd)

President Bush today reasserted the determination of the United States to remain a Pacific power, calling the region one "of great and growing importance in international affairs."

At a stop here en route to Tokyo for the funeral of Emperor Hirohito, Mr. Bush said he planned to strengthen relationships with friends and allies in a five-day journey that will take him to Japan, Beijing and Seoul, South Korea.

Mr. Bush previewed the trip, his first abroad as President, in a refueling stop at Elmendorf Air Force Base, halfway on the 15-hour flight. Speaking to American members of the armed services in a hangar, he said the trip has symbolic and substantive components.

"Alaskans understand that America is as much a Pacific nation as it is an Atlantic one—and that the Pacific region is of great and growing importance in international affairs," he said. "At each stop, I aim to strengthen key relationships with our friends and partners in the Pacific region."

'WE'RE READY TO ROLL, YEAH'

Although residents of Alaska and the Soviet Far East are increasing their cultural, diplomatic and scientific exchanges, Mr. Bush made no mention of the Soviet Union or the new warming. But he praised American troops based in Alaska as the "forward edge of our national defense."

"And make no mistake about the importance of your task," he said. "Alaska's strategic position, at the point where the Far East, the Western Hemisphere and the Arctic meet, is proof enough that the missions you perform here are vital to our national security."

Mr. Bush arrived at the Air Force base as a light but steady snow was falling. He was accompanied by Secretary of State James A. Baker 3d, the chief of staff John H. Sununu, Brent Scowcroft, the national security adviser, and other senior aides.

Asked by a reporter if he was heading to Tokyo with "new initiatives," he said, "We're ready to roll, yeah."

TRIP SCHEDULED AROUND FUNERAL

The President said it was important for the United States not to take the Asian nations for granted as the new Administration tackles other problems.

"There is something more than symbolism," he said of the trip to China, his fifth since he left there in 1975 after serving as chief American envoy. "That relationship is fundamental to any foreign policy equation of the United States."

"We don't ever want to neglect our friends," he said. "Yes, things in the Pacific seem to be going reasonably well, but we are a Pacific power and this visit will demonstrate that we intend to stay a Pacific power."

Before leaving Washington, senior Administration officials sought to lower expectations by noting that the trip was scheduled around the funeral Friday of Emperor Hirohito.

PRIVATE MEETINGS WITH LEADERS

Briefing reporters Tuesday on the eve of the visit, Mr. Scowcroft said that "the substance will not be extensive," although Mr. Bush is scheduled to hold private talks with more than a dozen heads of state in Tokyo.

"This trip is mainly an opportunity to have serious discussions at the outset of his Administration with such important Asian friends and allies and to reaffirm that the United States plans to play a strong and affirmative role as an Asian power," Mr. Scowcroft said.

Mr. Bush's three-day stay in Tokyo is to include private meetings with Japan's new Emperor, Akihito, and Prime Minister Noboru Takeshita.

The White House also made public the President's written answers to questions submitted by the Kyodo News Service, in which Mr. Bush minimized several potential disputes, including trade friction between the world's two largest economies, Japan's military spending and Japanese investment in the United States, which amounted to about 13 percent of all foreign investment by the end of 1987.

TOKYO'S FOREIGN-AID PACKAGE

Mr. Bush said, "It is important that our allies assume greater responsibility in the cause of global peace and prosperity." But he added: "It is not for me to prescribe Japan's role in the world. The decision is up to the Government and people of Japan."

While Japan's trade surplus with the United States has been edging down American officials estimate that it will still total about $80 billion by the end of the year.

Even so, Mr. Takeshita has received a favorable response from the Bush Administration by proposing to spend $10 billion in foreign aid in the fiscal year that begins in April. That is an increase of 7.6 percent and would surpass proposed American spending by $1 billion.

Mr. Bush told Kyodo that the Administration was "encouraged" by Japan's military spending, although "there was still room for greater improvement." Japan is planning to spend about 5.9 percent of its gross national product on defense, a percentage that some American lawmakers have asserted should be higher.

Mr. Bush has meetings with about a dozen leaders, including President Francois Mitterrand of France, President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt, King Hussein of Jordan, President Chaim Herzog of Israel, President Richard von Weizsäcker of West Germany, Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew of Singapore, President José Sarney of Brazil, King Baudouin of Belgium, Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto of Pakistan, President Ibrahim Babangida of Nigeria, Prime Minister Turgut Ozal of Turkey, and Prime Minister Chatichai Choonhavan of Thailand.

RELEARNING FROM JAPAN

(By Haynes Johnson)

In Tokyo, the greatest assemblage of world leaders—larger even than the one for John F. Kennedy's funeral—has paid last respects to Emperor Hirohito of Japan. In the gathering, of course, was President Bush.

State funerals are, by definition, symbolic affairs. None in modern times, and perhaps none in this century, has been so rich in symbolism and historical irony as that of Hirohito, especially in reference to the United States.

Just 44 years ago, Japan was in ruins, impoverished and desolate, its dreams of empire crushed by the overwhelming power of the United States. At that moment, the United States, conqueror and ruler of Japan, fully emerged as the world's preeminent superpower.

Now, the roles have been reversed. Japan has managed history's most spectacular comeback. It stands today as the newest superpower and moves rapidly to claim the position as the most technologically advanced nation. Japan is among the world's most affluent nations and its leading creditor. Its horizons appear unlimited.

The United States, if not in actual decline, is facing hard questions about its future, none more difficult than that of dealing with its relations with Japan. Once the leading creditor, the United States has become the world's leading debtor. In many areas, it present situation compares unfavorably with its erstwhile vanquished doe. Prominent are the following:

With half the population, Japan produces twice as many scientists and engineers as does the United States.

While the U.S. savings rate has fallen sharply in the last decade, Japan's continues to increase and now is twice that of the United States.

In terms of annual economic growth, as measured by gross national product statistics, Japan's growth rate is now three times as large.

The U.S. collective debt has multiplied, making it more difficult to compete in world markets. Japan's exports have increased accordingly. Its penetration of the American economy through a range of manufactured goods has been profound, and Japan now exports to the United States nearly three times what it buys from America.

Finally, a point made often in recent years but inexplicably without real political impact in presidential elections: Japan has succeeded in buying large segments of this country through direct investments in American companies, banks, real estate. Its direct investment in the United States, according to official estimates, exceeds $33 billion and is increasing.

All of these are reasons enough to ponder the comment of economist Lester Thurow, cited in Newsweek's report on Japan this week. "At the rate things are going," Thurow said, "we are all going to wind up working for the Japanese."

There were other obvious ironies connected with the funeral services telecast throughout the world. There was Bush, in office barely a month and an aviator shot down as a youth in the Pacific by Japanese planes. He may be the last of the World War II generation to rise to the top of American political leadership. Now he has paid tribute to the monarch whose 62-year reign was the longest of the century's major historical figures. Hirohito's time on the world stage far outlasted that of Lenin, Stalin, Churchill, Roosevelt, Hitler, Mao and lesser figures. It also encompassed the greatest shift in fortunes involving any two nations in that period.

In his lifetime, Hirohito presided over Japan's rise and fall—and then its rise again. He saw his small island nation survive the devastation of atomic war and loss of more than 3 million lives. Then, although Japan possessed nothing comparable to the natural resources of the United States and had a vastly smaller land mass and half the population, he watched it compete on equal terms and directly challenge the United States for world economic supremacy.

The lesson is simple. Japan accomplished this by demonstrating traits that, for generations, Americans most celebrated in themselves: hard work, perserverance, ingenuity, enterprise, appreciation of education and competition. Most of all, Japan has succeeded because it has not been content to stand still.

It is good that Bush went to Hirohito's funeral, a moment of both ceremonial and paramount historical significance. It would be even better if he studies the Japanese example and returns with renewed determination to stop the sense of drift and purposelessness that seem to have enveloped his new administration. He, and all Americans, have work to do.

EAGLE SCOUT AWARD

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to bring to the attention of my colleagues an exceptional young man from my district who has completed a major goal in his scouting career. Phillip Robert Augustyniak, Jr., will be awarded the rank of Eagle Scout at the Court of Honor to be held Sunday, March 5, 1989, at the Evangelical Lutheran Church of the Cross in Chicago, IL.

During his service as a scout, Phillip has proven his leadership abilities in several ways. He has held the positions of quartermaster, den chief, patrol leader of the eagle patrol and is currently a member of the leadership corps.

Phillip is a freshman at Luther High School South in Chicago, and has achieved many scholastic honors. In sixth and seventh grade he earned first place ribbons at the history fair and in eighth grade he received an honorable mention. He has also written for the school newspaper.

The Boy Scouts of America represents some of the finest youth in our country and the training and values they receive and develop during their years of scouting are invaluable to them and to their country.

I am sure my colleagues join me in extending heartfelt congratulations to Phillip on this outstanding achievement.

THE OATS PROMOTION ACT OF 1989

HON. TIM JOHNSON

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which I hope will help to solve the problem of increasing oats importation into the United States. My State of South Dakota is traditionally the No. 1 oats producing State in the Nation, however I increasingly hear from my producers that it does not make economic sense for them to plant oats. My producers along with others in this country are "planting for the program," and the current farm program is discriminating against oats.

The target prices for oats and several other of the feed grains have long been based on their feed value. One need look no futher than the grocery store shelf to see that oats have become an important part of many people's diets. I think it is time that we recognize the important food value of oats in our Federal farm programs. The legislation I am introducing today would raise the oats target price in an effort to encourage more oats plantings. It is also my hope that this move may indeed lead to some budget savings.

I have problems with the fact that this country, which has surpluses of many grains, would have to import 60 million bushels of oats to meet our domestic needs. We definitely have the capacity to produce more oats and producers would be willing to do so if they did not feel that they were being penalized. Planting oats makes sense from a conservation standpoint—they are often planted in a rotation to replenish the soil. If only it made economic sense to the producers and their bankers.

That is what I am attempting to do, and I would encourage my colleagues, both urban and rural, to support this effort.

HONORING LEVITTOWN (PA) BABE RUTH ALL-STARS

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues the great achievement of the Levittown Pennsylvania Babe Ruth All-Star Baseball Team. The team, led by the outstanding coaching of Harry O'Donnell and Bill Bowman, won the 1988 Pennsylvania Championship Title, was victorious in the Eastern United States Mid-Atlantic Regional, and came in fourth place in the Babe Ruth World Series in Lebanon, MO, in August 1988.

This accomplished team of 14 and 15-year-old players deserves great recognition, Mr. Speaker, for bringing such distinction to the town of Levittown, PA. The hard working team members who represented their town include Dustin DeFazio, Joe Doto, Gary Forrester, Mike Klein, Ed Lubinski, Mike Mannion, Dante Mucci, Casey O'Donnell, Chris Potts, Tom Raymond, Mike Ritter, Ryan Stefan, Brian West, Jeff Wilhelm, and Bob Windows.

Mr. Speaker, it takes a lot of loyalty and devotion and a lot of plain hard work and practice to achieve the level of success of the Levittown Babe Ruth All-Stars. I ask my colleagues to join me in commending this fine team and their outstanding coaches.

TRIBUTE TO THE PATIENT RELIEF PROGRAM

HON. DUNCAN HUNTER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, there is a group of people in San Diego, CA, who in various ways, have helped to change the lives of those ravaged by war. The Patient Relief Program is made up by physicians, hospitals, and private citizens who have banded together to nurse the victims of the wars in Afghanistan and Central America back to health. These talented men and women restore both physical and emotional health. San Diego's Patient Relief Program works in cooperation with the United States Government's Afghan Patient Relief Program, the Intergovernmental Committee on Migration, and the International Medical Corps.

All of the surgery and medical care performed is done free of charge. Food and housing are donated, or paid for by donations, local immigrant and refugee communities provide translation and run food banks.

The Los Angeles Shriners Hospital, the Frost Street Surgical Center, Scripps Memorial Hospital, and Sharp Memorial Hospital, have all done outstanding work for the Patient Relief Program. They've opened up their facilities to these patients free of charge and given them the best medical care available.

Many physicians, medical specialists, and therapists have selflessly volunteered to reconstruct war-torn children and adults. I would like to especially thank Drs. Richard Cunningham, Mark Rechnic, Michael Halls, Craig Dever, Richard Perlman, Ronald Hacker, Barbara Brem, Donald B. Dose, Harold Forney, Malton Johnson, Jonathan Jones, Susan Kay, Cammille Kochenderfer, Stephen Krant, and Arthur Sanford. Oculist Kirsten Kolberg-Applegate, BCO Gordon Kolberg, and therapist Sandy Doehr also have my thanks.

Without the help of private individuals and community leaders, the program could not have rebuilt so many lives. These men and women contributed countless amounts of time and money to care for the victims of war in Central America and in Afghanistan. Thanks to Karen Worthy, Pastor John Oien, Larry Dickson, Michael Foote, Engineer Dost Hayat, Dan McKinnon, Sue Reeves, Zia Waleh, and Dr. Sadruddin Shuhab Zadeh.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be associated with the Patient Relief Program. I am sure sometimes between the language barrier, international flights, visa problems, bureaucracy, long hours, and sometimes heartbreaking cases, these fine men and women if it is all worth it. But I am sure that the glow of one young patient's face, reminds them that their work is vital and deeply appreciated.

INTRODUCTION OF SMART START LEGISLATION

HON. DALE E. KILDEE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. KILDEE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be introducing legislation today to assist States and localities in establishing prekindergarten education programs. This measure is the House companion bill to S. 123, introduced by Senator KENNEDY, which is commonly referred to as "Smart Start."

Smart Start strives to assist families by providing communities with funding for comprehensive developmental services for 4 year olds. The additional experience which Smart Start contemplates is a worthwhile addition to the vital framework that is represented by the Act for Better Child Care which I introduced on January 3, 1989, as well as the Head Start Program. Along with these two vital building blocks, Smart Start can be a valuable component in an overall strategy of support for children and families.

My first priority remains the immediate passage of comprehensive child care legislation such as the Act for Better Child Care. The Act for Better Child Care [ABC] is a comprehensive bill which addresses the child care needs of families with children of all ages, from infancy through schoolage. It would bring the Federal Government into a partnership with States and the private sector to help build a sensible child care delivery system. It would also help low and moderate income families pay for child care.

ABC addresses the varity of child care needs of working parents. Smart Start takes an approach concentrating on a single, but important age group and is not a substitute for the Act for Better Child Care. Only ABC contains all of the ingredients essential for a comprehensive child care system. Smart Start, on the other hand, provides primarily 4 year olds with a holistic system of support by allowing State and local communities to channel funds to programs which operate full day and full year programs.

An equally important priority is Head Start. Head Start has provided comprehensive childhood development services to poor children for over 20 years yet is able to reach only a fraction of those eligibles for its outstanding services. This important program is up for reauthorization next year. Steps must be taken to ensure services for all Head Start eligible children by continuing to build this proven program which Congress has invested in so wisely since 1965.

I welcome suggestions and recommendations for additional issues that should be looked at when this legislation comes up for consideration. This legislation is an important contribution to the current debate.

EASTERN AIRLINES STRIKE

HON. DAN SCHAEFER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. SCHAEFER. Mr. Speaker, today we are on the brink of a national transportation emergency. Should the confrontation between Eastern Airlines and the machinist union remain unresolved, the union is prepared to disrupt service not only at Eastern but at several other airlines as well as at railroads.

The International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers and Eastern Airlines have been negotiating since September 1987. Attempts to settle contract disputes continued until January 31, 1989, when National Mediation Board Chairman Walter Wallace declared a deadlock. On February 2, a 30-day-cooling-off period began and the deadline of 12:01 a.m. Saturday, March 4 is now less than 48 hours away.

Under the Railroad Labor Act, the President has the option of establishing an emergency board to avoid possible interruption of interstate commerce. I believe the administration must evaluate whether the airline could continue to operate if an emergency session is convened. Such a move of this nature would have to make economic sense. Obviously, nobody wins if the airline does not stay solvent. During this period I believe that we should pursue sensible solutions to avert a potential transportation nightmare.

I am not advocating a prounion or antiunion position, rather I believe that the long and bitter dispute between Eastern and the machinists can and should be resolved through discussions not disruptions of service.

THE CONGRESSIONAL BICENTENNIAL

HON. PHILIP M. CRANE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, March 2, 1989

Mr. CRANE. Mr. Speaker, in 2 days, on March 4, 1989, we will mark the 200th anniversary of the convening of the First Federal Congress in New York City. This anniversary can be considered part of our ongoing celebration of the bicentennial of the Constitution.

As a member of the Commission on the Bicentennial of the U.S. Constitution, I am very pleased that Congress today held a joint meeting to formally recognize this institution's 200th birthday. Honoring the birthday of our Constitution and Congress is a little more challenging than generating the excitement that attended the bicentennial honoring the birth of the country. It may be even harder these days to generate enthusiasm for the congressional bicentennial in light of the recent pay raise fiasco and the budget deficit for which Congress must take a great deal of responsibility. However, despite these recent concerns and some bumps in the road along the way, we, as Americans, can certainly be proud of this institution and what it has accomplished over two centuries of work.

There have been many examples in history of people who secured independence from a monarchy or from the bondage of an oppressor nation. Yet many of these acts of independence have failed in the next step toward freedom—that step being to create an effective and responsible government which preserves each individual's liberty, life, and property.

Our democratic Republic with its three branches of government has indeed served us well and has preserved the freedom we all enjoy. As the legislative branch of our Government, Congress has served admirably in the balancing scheme our Founding Fathers created. We have much to be proud of, and we certainly ought to be taking the time to honor the 200th anniversary of the Congress, to reflect on our great heritage, and to honor all our colleagues, both past and present, for their distinguished and dedicated service in carrying on the traditions of this historic body.

I look forward to the continued celebration of the bicentennial of the Congress and the Constitution, and I hope that the events surrounding this celebration will further increase the appreciation and respect our people have for the Founding Fathers and this great country they created.

SENATE—Friday, March 3, 1989

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 3, 1989)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable CHARLES S. ROBB, a Senator from the State of Virginia.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D. offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

*Owe no man any thing, but to love one another * * .—Romans 13:8.

Gracious Father in Heaven, we tend to equate love with maudlin sentiment, but the Bible instructs us, God is love, which indicates it is the most powerful bonding force in history.

Mighty God, perfect in love, infuse this place with Your presence. As there is no symphony without distinct instruments and musicians—no tapestry without variety of color—as unity is meaningless without diversity, there is no democracy without citizens of divergent views and organizations with competing demands which generate controversy, and conflict, requiring compromise.

God of peace, remind us that "a house divided against itself cannot stand," and enable us, however great the pressure, to heed St. Paul's admonition, "Owe no man any thing, but to love one another * * *."

In the name of the Prince of Peace we pray. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

The assistant legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, DC, March 3, 1989.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable CHARLES S. ROBB, a Senator from the State of Virginia, to perform the duties of the Chair.

ROBERT C. BYRD,
President pro tempore.

Mr. ROBB thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF THE MAJORITY LEADER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the standing order, the majority leader is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SCHEDULE

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, at 10:30 this morning, the Senate will go into executive session to continue deliberations on the Tower nomination.

Following the leader time, there will be a period for morning business until 10:30.

On Wednesday and Thursday of next week, March 8 and 9, the Senate will begin deliberations on the motions filed by Judge Hastings relative to his impeachment trial. The Senate will hear argument on Judge Hastings' motions to dismiss some of the charges against him. That argument on the motions will occur between the hours of 2 and 4:30 p.m. on March 8.

On March 9, beginning at 2 p.m., the Senate will debate and consider the motions. These proceedings could well continue into the evening on that day. For the benefit of my colleagues planning their schedules, I hope they will clear their schedules during the times I have described in order to be present for these important deliberations.

RESERVATION OF LEADER TIME

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my leader time. I also request that the Republican leader's time be reserved.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 10:30 a.m., with Senators permitted to speak therein for 5 minutes each.

POSTAL OFF-BUDGET BILL—101ST CONGRESS

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I join many of my good friends in the Senate in cosponsoring S. 302, legislation which will remove the U.S. Postal Service from the unified Federal budget. Except for the effective date, this bill is identical to S. 2449, which had 74 cosponsors when the 100th Congress adjourned.

The Postal Service was originally off-budget under the Postal Service Reorganization Act. In 1974, the President exercised his discretion under the Reorganization Act to take the Postal Service off-budget in order to provide a businesslike environment free from political influence.

The Service remained off-budget until 1985 when the Office of Management and Budget proposed, in the President's fiscal year 1986 budget, to bring off-budget items on-budget. In order to display the proposal, the Budget brought Postal Service—and other previously off-budget items—into the budget.

Then in 1986, the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings proposal formalized what OMB had done informally the previous year; beginning with the fiscal year 1987 budget, the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings amendment has required that all Federal entities, including the Postal Service, be included in the Federal budget. The only exception is Social Security which is off-budget, but is figured into budget totals for purposes of the Gramm-Rudman deficit target.

The bill we introduce restores the pre-1985 situation, so that only the appropriations into the fund are on-budget, with the postal fund itself being an off-budget item. Beginning with fiscal year 1991, under our bill, the receipts and disbursements of the Postal Service would not be included in either the President's budget totals or the congressional budget resolution totals. In addition, the Postal Service budget would not be counted when calculating the deficit for Gramm-Rudman-Hollings purposes. Finally, the bill clarifies that the legislation does not in any way diminish Congress' oversight authority over the Postal Service.

Mr. President, this legislation is important to our Nation's ability to maintain an efficient, inexpensive, universal Postal Service. Subjecting the Postal Service to the uncertainties of the Federal budget process threatens its ability to maintain the service necessary to sustain the Nation's commercial and communications network. As an example, the 1987 budget reconciliation bill required a 1-year deferral of 65 percent of the 1988 postal capital investment program. This caused an unnecessary and unwise delay in the capital improvement of our postal system.

In addition to impeding improvements in Postal Service facilities and operations, the current on-budget treatment of the postal fund is unnecessary from a budgetary point of view. This is because the 1970 Reorganization Act mandates that the Postal Service break even. The Service generates its own revenue and receives no operating subsidies from the Treasury; and postal rates are adjusted, as required, to preclude deficit spending. As a result—using the Postal Service's accrual accounting—profits and losses have balanced out over the past 10 years.

Moreover, including the Postal Service's capital expenditures in our annual Federal budgets actually distorts the deficit picture. Unlike other Federal entities, Postal Service spends large portions of its budget on projects which are clearly capital expenditures. It is a distortion of the Federal deficit to treat these capital expenditures as up-front cash outlays, rather than expensing the projects over the life of the investment as businesses are accustomed to doing. For example, the Federal budget for fiscal year 1989 shows the Postal Service running a deficit of $655 million, while the Postal Service's accounting shows net income of $523 million; the difference is due to treatment of capital spending.

Annual accounting of the Federal Budget can also misrepresent the Postal Service's performance. The length of postal ratemaking proceedings and the need to avoid frequent rate changes gives the Postal Service a financial cycle of several years. While the Postal Service must break even over this cycle, the annual accounting of the Federal budget focuses on annual deficits in isolation from subsequent surpluses.

Mr. President, I support the concept of a unified budget to serve as a measure of the Federal budget's impact on the economy. However, the Postal Service is a unique entity. It is mandated by law to run on a break-even basis and is intended to operate in an independent businesslike environment, free from political influence. Removing Postal Service from the unified budget will not undermine the accuracy of our Federal budget and will ensure the continued independence and integrity of our Nation's postal system.

I urge every Senator to join now in cosponsoring this bill in order to assure passage of it in this Congress.

SECURITY IN THE NORTH PACIFIC

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, many in this body have expressed great interest in the proposals for force reductions announced by Soviet General Secretary Gorbachev at the United Nations. This Senator joins in hoping that this opening portends closer relations between our two nations. We cannot fail to recognize though the tremendous military power the Soviet Union continues to wield across the globe.

An article in the December 10 edition of Jane's Defense Weekly detailed Soviet capabilities and United States activities in the North Pacific. The threat in this region is real, and looms against the critical sealanes through which transit much of our Nation's domestic oil, as well as routes to our Pacific allies. I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. The presence of the U.S. Navy in the North Pacific has been enhanced by the expanded activities of the U.S. 3d Fleet, under the theater command of Adm. Huntington Hardisty, CINCPAC. Through exercises demonstrating the Navy's ability to undertake operations any time of the year, the 3d Fleet has put the Soviets on notice that the United States Navy is a permanent resident of the North Pacific.

The biannual joint service exercise "Brim Frost" was recently conducted in and around Alaska. The men and women of all the military services, the National Guard and the Reserves endured the harshest conditions recorded in Alaska in over a century. The unprecedented challenges of these extremes demonstrated the excellence and determination of our military forces. Sadly, "Brim Frost" was marred by the tragic loss of a Canadian Forces C-130. The sacrifice of these men will not be forgotten, and testifies to the close ties between our two military establishments.

Increasing attention has been paid to the vital strategic location of Alaska. This article in Jane's Defense Weekly highlights the naval importance of this region to our defense. I urge my colleagues to consider these issues as we face many difficult decisions in reviewing our defense spending and commitments this year.

EXHIBIT 1

NEW SIGNIFICANCE OF THE NORTH PACIFIC

(By James C. Borg)

As the United States pulls its warships out of the Persian Gulf in the wake of the Iran-Iraq war, the US Navy says more emphasis will be placed on the North Pacific, a remote and rugged region only recently recognised as critical in any US-Soviet conflict.

As US trade with Asia overtakes that with Europe, and with increasing Soviet naval strength in the Pacific, American naval forces have since 1986 stepped up operations in the chilly seas surrounding the Aleutians.

Not since the Second World War, which saw a 15-month Japanese occupation, has Alaska's 1609 km-long string of mountainous islands seen so much military activity.

The island of Adak, particularly with its airfield for navy P-3 Orion Soviet submarine-tracking patrol aircraft based at Petropavlovsk, would be a hotly contested battleground, the lynchpin for success of the so-called US maritime strategy in the Pacific.

Under that strategy, sometimes called horizontal escalation, the first hours of a US-Soviet conflict would find the navy engaging Soviet ships and submarines as they sail from their Pacific homeports of Petropavlovsk and Vladivostok.

"In a potential crisis situation, deterrence is best served by open and early positioning of forces for strikes against Soviet forces and warfighting facilities, and by showing our resolve to maintain peace and support for nations in the region," said Adm. Huntington Hardisty, Commander-in-Chief of the US Pacific Command, in a recent speech in Honolulu.

"Should the Soviets initiate hostilities in this theatre or initiate events elsewhere, US military forces are prepared to engage them rapidly and as far forward as possible to neutralise their warfighting capability."

In recent cold-weather operations in an around the Aleutians, US aircraft carrier battle groups and battleship task forces have successfully avoided detection by Soviet land-based 'Bear' bombers through surprise routes and 'terrain-masking', dodging radar behind the Aleutian peaks.

On at least one occasion, a carrier has come close to striking range of the Kamchatka Peninsula before being discovered, navy officials say.

However, there's no hiding Adak, a multipurpose base that includes a listening post for ocean acoustic sensors, or the air force installation at Shemya. A January 1987 amphibious landing at Adak and Shemya involving 14 ships, 12000 sailors, 115 aircraft and 2000 Marines, the first winter amphibious operation in the Aleutians since the Second World War, clearly showed to what lengths the Pentagon is prepared to go to defend the territory.

"Since I arrived here two years ago, we've done probably 10 times as many exercises in the Northern Pacific as we had in the preceding 10 years," said Vice Adm. Diego Hernandez, outgoing commander of the 3rd Fleet, which has the North Pacific and Bering Sea in its operational jurisdiction.

"The Persian Gulf took a tremendous number of ship days away from the time that's available for us to operate.

"Although we still have not realised any great savings in terms of force levels in the Middle East, we anticipate that once Iran and Iraq are able to reach final agreements, that, eventually, in a way that makes sense, there will be a gradual reduction to pre-war levels. And that will provide us with the ships and aircraft to devote to more exercises in the North Pacific."

Hernandez commands an operational structure vastly different from the one he inherited in August 1986.

Formerly based at Ford Island in Pearl Harbour, 3rd Fleet had been largely devoted to anti-submarine warfare and training in support of the US 7th Fleet, then the principal teeth of the Pacific Fleet and operating chiefly in the Far East.

Today, with its headquarters staff embarked aboard the USS Coronado (AGR 11), 3rd Fleet has become the navy's fourth 'fighting fleet'—along with the 7th and 6th and 2nd in the Mediterranean and Atlantic.

With more Soviet coastline in its area of responsibility than any of the others, the 'new' 3rd Fleet finds itself in a pivotal role in the maritime strategy, designed in part to keep the Soviets from shifiting Pacific Forces to a NATO conflict.

Soviet missile-firing SSBNs, patrolling quietly in their 'bastion' in the Sea of Okhotsk, presumably would be included as targets, even in a non-nuclear war, a course of action that has generated some controversy.

While some observers maintain that attacks on SSBNs would risk crossing the threshold to nuclear war, advocates of the maritime strategy insist it would apply pressure on the Soviets to end the conflict more quickly.

Adm. Hardisty said such attacks may be a matter of practicality, since there is no reliable way to differentiate missile-firing strategic submarines from attack boats carrying torpedoes and anti-ship cruise missiles.

"In an undersea war, everyone would be involved," he said.

While some submarine characteristics can be construed through sonar, the whole undersea friend-or-foe identification process remain undecided.

US submarines in a pack are commonly assigned separate horizontal operating zones, but there are a lot of doubts in the navy about what would happen in a 'melee' or battle involving many submarines.

What is clear is that the USA no longer concedes the North Pacific, once considered a "Russian lake", to its neighbour across the Bering Strait. The first signs of change came in early 1983.

The carriers Midway and Enterprise, steaming east across the Pacific, met with the carrier Coral Sea, steaming west. The three flat-tops and their escorts abruptly turned north toward the Aleutians.

There they were met by land-based air force fighter, bombers, tankers and AWACS radar planes and navy Orions. For the next several days and nights, in cold weather and heavy seas, more than 40 ships and submarines, 300 navy and air force aircraft and 23,000 military personnel carried out a fast-paced and finely tuned training exercise.

A Coast Guard cutter and four Canadian ships also sailed with the group. Code named 'Fleet EX 83-1', it was the biggest naval operation in 40 years, an unusual exercise that caught the Soviet Union off guard. When seas were too rough for the retrieval of carrier-based aircraft, KC-135 tankers circling above the armada refuelled the thirsty jets.

While the ships approached no more than 640 km from the Kamchatka Peninsula, more than 70 Soviet aircraft rushed out to meet the battle groups and were spotted by navy E-2 and air force E-3 AWACS radar aircraft. Soviet 'Bear' bombers, simulating missile launches against the ships, were intercepted by navy fighters and land-based air force F-15s under the tactical control of a navy cruiser.

B-52 bombers flew reconnaissance and mine-laying missions. The unprecedented demonstration of modern fleet muscle and reflexes and inter-service co-operation became the model for future training.

In August 1986, the carrier USS Carl Vinson steamed from the west coast across the Aleutians, then slipped into the Bering Sea, eluding for three days Soviet reconnaissance aircraft searching south of the island chain.

The next month, the carrier USS Ranger crossed the Pacific undetected on a course between Pearl Harbor, a fairly common port of call, and the Aleutians. In October, the battleship USS New Jersey raced through the Sea of Okhotsk, while, just to the south, the Ranger battle group operated with Japanese maritime forces.

At the same time, south of the Aleutians, the Constellation battlegroup trained with Canadian naval forces. The following January, the Vinson, returning from the Indian Ocean, rendezvoused near Shemya with the helicopter carrier USS Belleau Wood, which led the amphibious landings of exercise 'Kernel Potlatch 87'.

The training drove home new lessons in winter naval warfare as sailors struggled with icy flight decks, brutal winds and heavy clothing.

Surprisingly, said Hernandez, former captain of the carrier USS John F. Kennedy, Nimitz class 'supercarrier' Vinson was able to launch and retrieve aircraft by adjusting its speed to the sea state even after bad weather had closed onshore airfields.

Summarizing this activity in the December 1987 issue of the journal Morskoy Sbornik, a Soviet reserve captain declared: "Despite its peaceful name, the Pacific Ocean was and remains far from peaceful."

In large measure designed to protect Alaska's North Slope oil shipments, today's emphasis on the North Pacific is, according to the navy, in response to enhanced Soviet Pacific naval forces.

Currently the largest of the four Soviet ocean-going fleets, by US count the Soviet Pacific Fleet has 25 strategic submarines, more than 100 attack submarines and 723 surface ships, including 95 major surface combatants, led by two Kiev class helicopter carriers and a Kirov nuclear-powered guided-missile cruiser.

Since 1984, the Soviets have introduced 'Fencers', 'Foxhounds', 'Fulcrums' and 'Flankers', all fourth generation fighter aircraft, as well as naval aviation bombers and reconnaissance aircraft. The US Pacific Fleet by contrast has fewer than 300 ships and submarines.

Pacific commander Hardisty insists the Soviet fleet has shown little evidence of Mikhail Gorbachev's perestroika. "His proposals may be a ruse to undercut the strong alliances we maintain in the Pacific, or they may be a genuine effort on the part of the Soviets to reduce military tensions and create an international environment where internal political and economic reform can be undertaken," said Hardisty.

"Frankly, it is too soon for us to determine their sincerity, since there is still a wide gap between Gorbachev's rhetoric and actual Soviet deeds."

Hernandez, meanwhile, said exercises have proved that the 3rd Fleet can operate year-round in the North Pacific as long as battle plans remain flexible.

"The weather will influence the training, the pace of what one's doing, but if the plans are flexible, so that you can implement them every time you have an opening, then we find that you can maintain the initiative," says Hernandez.

An important by-product, he said, has been increased co-operation and interoperability with the air force's Alaskan Air Command and NORAD.

OIL FROM ALASKA'S COASTAL PLAIN

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, the Coastal Plain of Alaska's Arctic National Refuge has the greatest potential for new discoveries of oil and gas of any unexplored onshore area in the United States. Exploration and development of this area is critical to maintaining domestic energy reserves.

My colleague from Alaska, Senator MURKOWSKI, and I have introduced legislation to allow leasing of the Coastal Plain to go forward. We previously introduced this bill in 1987. We also introduced an amendment which reflects the progress made on this matter during the last Congress, while protecting Alaska's interests in development of the Coastal Plain.

Mr. President, our country's rapidly increasing reliance on foreign sources of oil is cause for alarm. U.S. oil consumption is up, domestic production is down, and imports are increasing. During January, the American Petroleum Institute reported that during December 1988, oil imports actually exceeded domestic production.

Even with the price of oil moving between $13 and $14 a barrel, as it was toward the end of 1988, oil imports represent a major portion of our trade deficit. During November, the most recent month for which complete information is available, we spent $3.13 billion on foreign oil. That month our trade deficit was $12.51 billion, meaning one quarter was attributable to oil imports.

As the price of oil rises, and as our imports increase, the spending on foreign oil will continue to climb. Some in this Chamber have talked at great length about the evils of high trade deficits. Here is a major component of those deficits, and unless we take action now it will dominate our trade figures for decades.

Aside from the economic impact of reliance on foreign oil, there is also a potential threat to national security. When we no longer have control over our major sources of oil, we are subject to threatened or actual sudden disruptions of that supply. Oil was used as an economic weapon against this country in the 1970's. Based on current trends, that could happen again during the 1990's and beyond.

The decline in domestic production is in part due to the low oil prices of the last few years. Reserves which are more expensive to produce, or stripper wells which produce too little to offset the cost of continued production have been shut in. But this is just a precursor to what will occur as proven domestic reserves are depleted.

Alaska currently produces slightly more than 2 million barrels of oil each day—about 25 percent of all U.S. productions. However, Prudhoe Bay, the largest oil field in North America at 10 billion recoverable barrels, has already produced more than 6 billion barrels. Production from Prudhoe and other North Slope fields will soon begin a rapid decline, and by the year 2000, production is expected to be only 600,000 barrels a day.

Oil production in the South 48, as we call it, has declined over the last 10 years. Only the regular increase in Alaska's production has offset this decline. As proven reserves are drawn down, U.S. production will drop off and it will not increase without additions to our reserves. The only way to significantly improve our reserves is to explore areas like ANWR's Coastal Plain.

There are ways to extend our existing reserves. There is renewed attention to research into enhanced oil recovery techniques, as well there should be. Existing technologies, such as waterflooding to maintain reservoir pressure, have increased expected recovery from Prudhoe Bay by more than a billion barrels, and extended the life of the field by about 5 years.

Enhanced recovery from existing field can supplement our energy supply. It can not, however, be a complete substitute for the location of new oil reserves. Our economy, and particularly our transportation sector is heavily reliant on oil. Congress has approved and I have supported legislation encouraging the development of vehicles which can use ethanol and methanol based fuels. However, we are decades away from feasible alternatives to our reliance on fossil fuels.

For the foreseeable future we are going to need oil If we do not take actions to reserve the trends I have already discussed, we will be inescapably dependent on foreign sources for that oil. President Bush recognizes the national security implications of this situation—he mentioned them just the other day.

We know that we need to seek out new reserves of oil and gas in this country. We know that the Coastal Plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge has about the highest potential for containing those reserves of any area in the country. The area we are talking about is less than 100 miles from the first, second, and ninth largest oil fields in North America, which share the same basic geologic structure.

All of this clearly weighs in favor of allowing exploration and development of the ANWR Coastal Plain. Only one credible objection has been heard—that before leasing of the Coastal Plain takes place we should be assured that it will be done in an environmentally sensitive manner.

The best evidence we have available to us is the history of development of the other North Slope oil fields. Years of experience in the Arctic have improved oil field technology to the point that the ninth largest field in America—Endicott—fits on 56 acres on two gravel islands. Years of study of wildlife and the environment in the Prudhoe area have demonstrated ways to minimize the impact oil and gas fields. These lessons can be carried over to the Coastal Plain.

In the Arctic, the exploratory phase need not have any noticeable impact on the environment. Drilling is done during the winter, using ice access roads, ice air strips if necessary, and can use ice or removable drilling pads. With the coming of spring, the ice melts and all that is left is a hole in the ground and a marker post. Any patches of vegetation which may have been damaged come back quickly with a bit of reseeding.

During the development of new fields on the Coastal Plain, a carefully planned infrastructure of gathering lines, service roads and well pads would be put in place. Again, most of the work would be done during the winter, when it will have the least possible effect on the landscape and there are few animals in the area.

The legislation which I have introduced with Senator MURKOWSKI would require all development to be subjected to a strict standard of environmental protection. Only activities resulting in no significant adverse effect on fish and wildlife, their habitat and the environment will be permitted.

As I said, the concern for impacts on the environment—assuring that the imapct on wildlife and on the tundra will be kept to an absolute minimum—is a valid concern. There has been an effort, however, to raise bogus concerns about the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

For many people in the United States, the wilds of Alaska represent a dream of untouched expanses. They may or may not get to see Alaska during their lives, but they have heard of it, and they know it is there.

That image is, I believe an important one for the human spirit. Take a person who lives out there on the eastern seaboard, where cities dump their raw sewage in the ocean, where other cities send the ash from their incinerators to Africa, and where the air may be unfit for them to breathe and the water unfit to drink. They seem to grab onto that image of Alaska and the other wild parts of the Earth to sustain themselves.

As a result, they are vulnerable. They are vulnerable to extreme environmentalists who play on their fears that the wilds may be destroyed. These groups wring thousands, even millions of dollars out of poor souls by telling them that drilling in the Arctic is like damming the Grand Canyon. What they fail to mention is that 56 million acres of Alaska are already permanently protected for future generations in wilderness, and at the beginning of this decade more than 100 million acres of Alaska were placed in various conservation units, effectively closed to most forms of development. These groups have the gall to identify their efforts to close the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge's Coastal Plain as the top environmental priority, the most important conservation decision this Nation faces.

And there are some in Congress who will listen to this balderdash. They will ignore the real problems this country faces. They will continue to allow our trash and our wastes to be shipped to Third World nations, and then will demonstrate their strong concern for the health and wellbeing of the people by opposing efforts to provide heat and light at a reasonable price to those same people.

If there is a critical issue in this debate, it is providing a stable supply of energy for the United States. I hope that the Senate will recognize the importance of the oil and gas resources of the Coastal Plain, and will move quickly on this legislation.

JESSE HELMS

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, Senators come and go, but oftentimes there are Senators who make an incredible impact during the time they are in the Senate. On the airplane a couple weeks ago, returning to my State of Idaho, I was reading the January/February edition of Conservative Digest which contained an article on our distinguished colleague, Senator JESSE HELMS from North Carolina.

I ask unanimous consent that the article, "The Stouthearted Jesse Helms," be printed in the RECORD for all of our colleagues to have the opportunity to review.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE STOUTHEARTED JESSE HELMS

(By Paul M. Weyrich)

1. Which candidate running in North Carolina in 1984 received the highest percentage of the black vote?

A. President Ronald Reagan.

B. Representative Bill Cobey.

C. Senator Jesse Helms.

2. Which U.S. Senator is known to staffers inside the Senate as the most caring and the kindest to the "little people"?

A. Chris Dodd.

B. Alan Cranston.

C. Jesse Helms.

3. Which U.S. Senator compiled the most impressive record for the passage of substantive legislation in the 100th Congress?

A. Ted Kennedy.

B. Lowell Weicker.

C. Jesse Helms.

Contrary to attempts by the mass media in the Tar Heel state to distort the man's image and accomplishments, the answer to all three questions is "C," Senator Jesse Helms. And despite their efforts to defeat this principled man, Jesse Helms is completing his third term in the Senate and is a good bet for a fourth term.

While the media in the Senator's home state portray him as the enemy of minorities, the meanest man in the Senate, and a legislator who is isolated and ineffective, the facts say otherwise.

HIGH APPROVAL AMONG MINORITIES

In his 1984 reelection bid Jesse Helms won six percent more of the black vote than did the very popular Ronald Reagan. Bill Keyes, chairman of Black PAC which assisted Helms in that race, says "that's because blacks know when someone is being honest with them." Keyes also notes that had Helms garnered the percentage of the black vote Republican candidates have traditionally received in North Carolina, he would have been narrowly defeated. Thus, despite efforts by the media in the state to portray Jesse Helms as intensely disliked by the minority population there, blacks were instrumental in returning Jesse to the Senate. They know the real Jesse Helms—and they like him.

COMPASSION AND HUMILITY WIN FRIENDS

The North Carolina media, particularly the newspapers, have also portrayed Helms as mean and forbidding. While there is no doubt that he is tough, even his enemies concede that the senior Senator from North Carolina is a gentleman in battle: polite, courteous, and almost always in good humor.

A great many Senators, both Democrat and Republican, are filled with their own self-importance, believe themselves to be Presidential material, and have a poor relationship with their staff. Jesse Helms, on the other hand, suffers no delusions and is beloved by his staff. He has a reputation for keeping staffers forever, despite the fact that he pays lower salaries than almost any other Senator. Many of the Helms staff are like Dr. Jim Lucier, the able chief minority counsel of the Senator Foreign Relations Committee, who has been with Helms since he entered the Senate following his upset victory in 1972.

These staffers have a genuine affection for their boss because he takes a personal interest in them, always remembering to ask about their families and sympathizing with them over ailments or injuries. Startled lower-echelon staffers on committees have for years talked about calls from Senator Helms wishing them a Merry Christmas and thanking them for their good work. "I've worked in the Senate for most of my adult life," said one such clerk, "and no Senator ever called to say thanks except Helms."

Helms is also famous for his warm personal notes not only to his colleagues, but to constituents and nonconstituents alike. Time and again, when Helms has heard of a hardship situation, he has prevailed upon friends to help out; they can't turn him down because he himself gives so generously whenever asked. That is a side of the man the media in his state don't play up. But then, neither does Jesse Helms. Unlike many of his colleagues, Jesse Helms doesn't strut and boast about his charitable works. When asked why, Helms talks about the passage in the New Testament that admonishes believers to do their good works in secret so that their treasure may be stored in Heaven, not on earth.

AN ABLE AND EFFECTIVE STRATEGY

But without question, the greatest media distortion has been in the area of Senator Helms's legislative accomplishments. The media portray him as an isolated and ineffective Senator and decry his use of the filibuster (Helms is skillful at using it to block noxious legislation) as "obstructionist." His colleagues, however, say otherwise.

"I only wish he weren't always so effective," says Kansas Senator Nancy Kassebaum, a moderate Republican who often disagrees with Jesse Helms. "While Senator Helms and I don't agree on all the issues, I have enormous respect for this ability to be able to establish an effective agenda for his views. He knows how to use the rules. He knows how to legislate. Yet, despite our differences, he has never tried to block me from speaking or in any way inhibit my efforts." Senator Kassebaum gives Helms high marks for his work as the ranking Republican on the Senator Foreign Relations Committee where she serves with him: "He has tried very hard to work with the differing views on the Foreign Relations Committee and has really succeeded. Sometimes he feels so strongly about an issue he feels he must assert his own views and doesn't seek consensus, but even then he tries to be fair to the rest of us. I enjoy working with him a great deal."

Colorado Senator Bill Armstrong, chairman of the Senate GOP Policy Committee, is another who admires what Jesse Helms has accomplished: "Anybody who thinks that Jesse Helms isn't making an enormous difference, just isn't paying attention to what's going on." Armstrong says that "from abortion to foreign policy Jesse Helms has led he fight on many of the most important issues in the Senate in this era."

And former Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole, wife of Senator Minority Leader Bob Dole and herself a North Carolinian, calls Helms "one of the most respected legislators of our time . . . a man of enormous integrity."

It is his reputation for integrity that has enabled Jesse Helms to be such an effective Senator. Consider this record: In the month before the 100th Congress adjourned, Helms participated in 27 winning efforts. "I don't recall anything like it," says Assistant Secretary of Defense Margo Carlisle, who was for many years a Senate aide and was Director of the Senate GOP Conference for four years.

These measures included: authorization of priority North Carolina freeway projects; extension of the Au Pair program; a ban on the transfer of satellite missile-launching technology to Communist China until Peking stops selling missiles to the Middle East; a ban on the broadcast of indecent material on radio and television; rejection of Senator Bill Bradley's attempt to add tougher warning on cigarette packages (of great interest to North Carolina); an amendment to the crime bill providing for a mandatory 20-year sentence for the possession of crack; an amendment requiring mandatory revocation of parole, probation, and supervised release for those convicted of the possession of illegal drugs. The pace of the Helms legislative effort was breathtaking: Eight of his amendments and resolutions were passed in a single day.

The breadth and scope of the Helms legislative efforts is what amazes me," says Jade West, executive director of the Senate Steering Committee. "Many Senators confine their legislative activity to the Committees on which they sit. But Helms has legislative initiatives which have succeeded in almost every arena."

The Helms record in the 100th Congress is absolutely dazzling, especially in the face of a Democratic majority bent on having their way. Here are just a few of the measures Jesse Helms successfully championed:

Compensation of the United States taxpayers for damages to national security caused by those who violate national security export controls.

An explanation by the President as to whether Soviet violations of the ABM Treaty jeopardize U.S. national interests and whether the U.S. should withdraw from such a treaty.

An amendment (passed by one vote) prohibiting the State Department from purchasing (with the taxpayers' money) a house for the Secretary of State.

An amendment prohibiting funds for the Centers for Disease Control from being used to provide any AIDS educational or preventative material that promotes, encourages, or condones homosexual activities or the intravenous use of illegal drugs.

An amendment authorizing the U.S. Navy to sink any Iranian vessel, destroy any Iranian missile battery, or neutralize any Iranian installation that threatens safe passage of any American warship or of any other vessel known to have a U.S. citizen on board.

A measure to help prevent rape and other sexual crimes by prohibiting dial-a-porn operations.

Repeal of the law passed by the District of Columbia City Council that provided insurance companies could not test for the deadly AIDS virus.

Economic sanctions against the Marxist regime that is committing genocide by starvation in Ethiopia.

These are but a few of the dozens of pages of Helms initiatives in the 100th Congress. Not all of his amendments or bills were approved. But some of the votes he managed to get on record, even with his losing amendments, allow us to identify the true conservatives. And those votes were useful last November in exposing liberals up for reelection and defending some conservative U.S. Senators.

Remember that the Senate is controlled by Democrats. So, far from being isolated and ineffective as the media claim, Jesse Helms was able to secure enough opposition votes to get a great deal of his legislation passed. Indeed an amazing number of his bills were co-sponsored by Democrats. Senator Helms has even managed to work effectively with the liberal chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Claiborne Pell (D-RI).

As Senator Armstrong has pointed out: "Of all the Senators on either side of the aisle, Helms is probably taken the most seriously. In fact, he has become a lightning rod on some of the most crucial issues of this era. When other Senators know he is going to move, they know they have to pay attention because Helms never does anything unless it has a real purpose and meaning."

Mrs. Carlisle summed it up this way: "I doubt that one North Carolinian in five understands the extraordinary legislative ability of their senior Senator. It is amazing to those of us who have been associated with the Senate for a long time that Helms would be pictured in any way but as one of the most effective Senators in this era."

The problem lies not in what Jesse Helms is but rather in what he is not. In an age of television pretty boys, Jesse Helms is not an image-conscious, plastic, blow-dried Senator. In an age of party-goers too lazy to push buttons on automatic elevators, Jesse Helms, despite having an able staff, does his own work. In an age of pork-barrel compro-misers, Jesse Helms stands true to his principles. In an age of phony compassion, Jesse Helms performs his charity without fanfare and television cameras.

That Helms is able to win reelection despite the false image created by hostile media in North Carolina is a tribute to the loyalty of those who know him personally and are not misled. Those Tar Heelers and thousands of admirers across the nation who think of Jesse Helms as their Senator make it possible for Helms to purchase the time to tell his story and partially offset the negative image created by the constant media pounding he takes year in and year out.

One can only speculate about what sort of margins Helms would win by if he were fortunate enough to have media which merely reported on what he accomplishes each year in the Senate. It might be overwhelming enough to scare away any opposition.

COMPASSION AND PRINCIPLE

(By Bob Harris)

Gayle Bomar's Saturdays were full of touchdown passes and gridiron glory. The star quarterback for the University of North Carolina Tar Heels was frequently asked to appear at children's hospitals and clinics across North Carolina where his stories of football exploits could brighten the day for children battling handicaps and illness. During one visit to the North Carolina Cerebral Palsy Hospital at Duke University in Durham, Bomar met an unexpected visitor down on his hands and knees playing with the children.

"I was astonished to see it was Mr. Helms," Bomar recalls. "I had heard professors criticize him because he was conservative, and here was this man pictured as some kind of ogre so obviously full of concern for these little kids. It gave me a new perspective on him, and also on some of the things that pass for wisdom on many of our college campuses."

It might have surprised a young college student like Gayle Bomar who had never met Jesse Helms. But to people who have known Jesse Helms for years, it wouldn't have been anything out of the ordinary. Just another example of the hidden side of an extraordinary man who cares.

The Cerebral Palsy Hospital in Durham is just one of the many "good works" Jesse Helms has been involved with over the years. The hospital is sustained with contributions raised by yearly telethons broadcast statewide by WRAL-TV and a network of stations. The originator of the fundraising idea was the then operations manager of WRAL—Jesse Helms. "The hospital would not have been possible without the continuing help of Jesse Helms," said Dr. Lenox Baker, founder of the Cerebral Palsy Medical Center. "It would never have gotten off the ground." According to Dr. Baker, "Jesse Helms has raised more money to help crippled children than any other man in North Carolina."

ACTIONS SPEAK LOUDER

A skeptic might point out that politicians and television personalities often get involved in charitable work. Sure, it costs them a little time and effort. But the payoff in good PR yields big dividends. Fair enough. Even the most hard-bitten skeptic, however, might change his or her mind if they knew about an experience in the personal lives of Jesse and Dorothy Helms.

It was Christmas time 1962 when Dot and Jesse Helms read in the newspaper about a young boy in Greensboro with Cerebral Palsy who had lost his parents. The article said that all the youngster wanted for Christmas was a mother and father. They were touched as any of us would be. But, unlike most of us, Jesse and Dot Helms took the next step: They adopted Charles, giving a brother to 13-year-old Nancy and 16-year-old Jane.

Jesse Helms visited Dr. Baker at the Cerebral Palsy Hospital to find out what might be done to help Charles. When he told "Doc" Baker that he and Dot planned to adopt the baby, Dr. Baker expressed reservations. He wondered how Charles might fit in. "We're the ones who will fit in," Helms reassured him. After four operations and a great deal of love from his new family, Charles Helms is today a successful businessman in Winston-Salem, North Carolina.

Charles Helms is reluctant to talk about his adoption. He knows his father frowns upon those who retell the story for fear that some people might think it was being told for political gain. But in a 1984 interview, Charles Helms did say of his father, "He has strong views, and he expresses them distinctly. But he is a very gentle man. I don't think anybody could do any better for a daddy."

Those who have not met Jesse Helms personally may find it hard to believe how gentle and kind this man really is. The mass media portray him as the fire-breathing conservative dragon of the U.S. Senate, and his Democrat critics and their media allies call him "Senator No" or the "Prince of Darkness." (The liberals fear a man they can't intimidate and control.) But, as Douglas Kiker, a veteran reporter for NBC News who has followed Helms' career, put it, "If a political profile of Jesse Helms comes down to one thing, it is compassionate. On a personal level, Helms is a man deeply into good works."

GROWING UP SOUTHERN

Born October 18, 1921, to Jesse and Ethel Helms, young Jesse was taught early by his father, "When you take a stand, stay there, unless you are really proved wrong." Jesse's father earned $25 a week as the police and fire chief in Monroe, North Carolina, population 3,000. Family life in this small Southern town centered around the home, the school, and the church.

Even though Senator Helms' father, "Big Jesse" as he was known, only had a fifth grade education, Senator Helms remembers him as "the wisest man I ever knew. I remember him saying on many occasions that a man's word is his bond."

"Big Jesse's" lessons on honesty stuck. A political opponent who had done business with Jesse Helms before his election to the Senate once remarked, "I'd give him uncounted money in a minute and never have a thought about it."

His parents taught him about the value of hard work. Mama greeted Jesse and his brother every morning with the same cheery call when it was time to get up and go to school. "Get up out of bed, you'll never make a nickel in there."

During those tough Depression years Jesse held a succession of jobs—cotton picker, floor sweeper, soda jerk, and, most interesting for him, sports writer for the local newspaper. Jesse wasn't very good at sports ("I had three left feet," he recently told an interviewer) but he had a knack for sports reporting. At the age of nine, he wrote his first newspaper article describing how the local football team, the Purple Pythons, had finally won a game after a long losing streak. "The Purle Pythons uncoiled today . . ." the story began.

Lessons taught by his teachers also helped shape the character of Jesse Helms. The Senator still tells the story of Miss Annie Lee, an eighth-grade English teacher who lectured the students on the proper use of grammar. Her pet peeve was split infinitives. Forty years later, at the end of a long Senate Committee meeting where a bill was being drafted, Senator Helms would tell his friend Hubert Humphrey the story of Miss Annie and the Minnesota lawmaker would heartily agree to delete a split infinitive from the bill.

Helms also remembers one prediction Miss Annie made that had nothing to do with English class. On the day in 1933 when the United States suspended the Gold Standard, Miss Annie pointed to the lessons of history to show that countries which backed their currencies with nothing more than paper suffered long-term economic harm. "She said it would now be easy for the government to spend money that it doesn't have, weakening our currency with indebtedness. She was right. It happened," the Senator recalls.

Another important influence on Jesse Helms was Ray House, the principal of Monroe High School. Ray House was more than a principal. He was the high school band instructor and, more than that, a wise counselor. Mr. House would call each high school senior and ask them what they planned to do for the future. When he asked Jesse Helms if he intended to go to college, Helms answered that he didn't think the family could afford it. "That's when he gave me a lecture that has stayed with me ever since," Jesse Helms says.

The principal told him there were jobs available for students who were willing to work hard and do anything that was honest to achieve success. He said that a college degree was not necessary for success unless a student was planning on entering a profession like medicine or law. But he counseled Jesse Helms to go to college to learn how to learn.

FROM BROADCASTING TO THE U.S. SENATE

Jesse Helms worked as a post-hole digger and dishwasher to support himself at Wake Forest College. Later, he got a job proofreading copy at night for the Raleigh News & Observer and eventually worked up to reporting on sports. While working on the sports desk, Jesse Helms met another reporter at the paper, Dorothy Coble. A romance developed and as Senator Helms told a newspaper interviewer several years ago, "Dot's desk was between the water cooler and the sport desk. It was a hot summer and I was unusually thirsty that summer." They were married on Halloween in 1942.

During World War II, Helms served in the Navy. After the war he returned to the paper. A few months later he began his career as a broadcaster. Helms was responsible for 15-minute news broadcasts on WRAL, a fledgling station in Raleigh, North Carolina. Helms and WRAL pioneered the use of recorded sound bites. That was in the days before audiotape and Helms recorded his news interviews on a wire recorder that was as heavy to lug around town as the tuba he had played in the high school band.

In the early 1950s, Helms went to Washington as chief aide to two North Carolina Senators. He later became editor of a banking industry magazine. But the broadcasting business beckoned again in 1960 and Helms became the editorialist and operations manager for WRAL-TV. Under Helms the station quickly earned a reputation as "The Voice of Free Enterprise" in eastern North Carolina.

The editorials Helms wrote won praise from thousands of Americans—and the condemnation of liberal editors and Chapel Hill professors. He took strong stands on controversial issues like morality and the anti-war radicals who marched in our streets under the banner of the Vietcong.

In 1970, Jesse Helms accompanied his 21-year-old daughter Nancy down to the Board of Elections when she went to register to vote. Amazingly, she registered Republican at a time when most Southerners automatically registered Democrat. When her father asked her why, she told him that the way he talked around the dinner table, he ought to be a Republican because the Democratic Party was no longer representing the views in which he believed. Jesse Helms changed his registration to Republican. When he reminisces about the incident, he laughingly says, "A little child shall lead them."

In 1972, at the insistence of friends, Jesse Helms put his name on the ballot for United States Senator. He says today that he didn't expect to win since no Republican had been elected to the Senate from North Carolina in this century. But he won.

He won something else in that campaign as well—something more important than an election—a personal relationship with the Lord. Helms explained his religious experience in a conversation with Tar Heel Magazine several years ago:

"I got so depressed," Helms recalled, dredging from his memory the overwhelming tiredness he had felt as he headed out to attend yet another breakfast. "I was thinking, 'Lord, have mercy, What am I doing here? I don't even want to be in politics. I'm running myself to death.' And for the first time, I really prayed. Not, 'Lord, let me win'—I didn't think I was going to win anyhow—but 'Lord, don't let me embarrass my family. Help me to do what's right in this thing. Help me live through it somehow.' I don't know how long that went on, but when I got through, I looked out the window and the sun was shining. I had the greatest feeling of serenity that I'd ever had. I've got it today. I don't worry about things. I do the best I can and let 'er fly.

"Up until that point, I think, my religion was sort of rote," he explained. "I'd go to church on Sunday mornings; I taught Sunday school; I did all the proper things. But I don't think it was until that very morning that it really dawned on me what this was all about."

A QUIET FAMILY LIFE

Jesse and Dot Helms live a quiet life in their modest home in Arlington, Virginia, outside Washington, D.C. Jesse rises at 6 or 6:30 and reads the papers while Mrs. Helms cooks breakfast. Then he drives to the Capitol for the Senate sessions. In the evenings, Jesse and Dot Helms aren't part of the cocktail party circuit. Most of their evenings are spent quietly at home talking over that day's events after a simple dinner. "Jesse is a meat and potatoes man," Mrs. Helms says. "He likes steak and french fries. He's not much on me trying out my new recipes."

Dot Helms is every bit a believer in Jesse Helms' conservative principles as he is. After her cancer surgery in 1988 (she is well recovered now), she insisted that Senator Helms keep a speaking engagement on the INF Treaty even though he was ready to cancel it. She is active in the Senate Wives Bible Study group. Both of them share a common pride and joy—six grandchildren. The youngest, born last April, was three months premature and weighed only 2½ pounds at birth. "We lived on a diet of fingernails," Granddad says. "She made her first trip away from home except to go to the doctor of course, and she came to see us on Thanksgiving. She is now pushing 13 pounds. The prettiest little red head you ever saw."

As Senator Helms is fond of saying, "You don't spend time with young people. You invest it." And he's invested a lot of time. He regularly meets with groups of students in Washington and takes time to explain the inner workings of government. Back home in North Carolina, Jesse Helms was instrumental in establishing Camp Willow Run, an interdenominational Christian youth camp on Lake Gaston.

STANDING ON PRINCIPLE

Jesse Helms is the kind of leader who makes some politicians in Washington squirm. Forthright in his own beliefs and with the courage of his convictions, Jesse Helms has proven his willingness to battle for what's right, no matter the risk to his own career or reputation. He lives and acts by a simple creed: "You have to have certain basic principles and you better be dogone certain that they're predicated on what's fair, what's possible, what's equitable and what's honest."

When Gorbachev comes to visit, Jesse Helms declines the chance to be part of Gorby's glitzy propaganda show. When Ted Kennedy prattles about welfare reform, Helms wonders why it has to cost working taxpayers $3 billion and won't require a single able-bodied welfare recipient even to think about working until 1994. Senator Helms believes that the people ought to be supreme, not nine unelected, unaccountable judges on a Supreme Court that imperially strikes down 175 years of law and tradition and declares voluntary school prayer is illegal.

There are those in Washington always eager to appropriate the taxpayers' money for this or that worthy cause. Asking these politicians to put their own money where their mouth is, Helms proposed an amendment requiring Senators to donate $1,000 of their own personal money to the worthy cause they champion. You don't win love notes from the Washington press corps and the liberals that way. But you win the respect of millions of Americans who are struggling to support their families and pay their taxes.

I was a 13-year-old in junior high when Jesse Helms first ran for the United States Senate in 1972, and remember hoping that he would win. I wanted him to win because he was the fellow on TV who said it was wrong for Vietnam war protestors to march under the Communist flag of Ho Chi Minh and the Vietcong. Ho Chi Minh and the Vietcong were the enemy of freedom in Vietnam and I was glad somebody was willing to speak out against their supporters.

I also remember the day a Republican campaign worker came by school to give a talk about the electoral process, and I told him I wanted Helms to win. He must have told Jesse Helms about it because shortly after Helms won, I got a call from him. That made a lasting impression on me. And in the years since, as I've watched him stand up for what is right and true—and take the heart in Washington for doing so—my respect for this principled American patriot has grown tremendously.

RICHARD "DICK" FLETCHER

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, America recently lost a great friend. Richard Fletcher was the executive director of the national Sigma Nu fraternity for many years. Richard Fletcher has had an incredible impact on so many lives in America. I had the opportunity to meet him when I was in college, and I remember the inspirational speeches he gave when he would visit our chapter at the University of Idaho.

Mike Antonovich, who is a supervisor of the Fifth District of the board of supervisors of the county of Los Angeles, sent me this article and asked that I might consider inserting it in the RECORD on behalf of so many people who had the opportunity to know the late Richard Fletcher. It is written by Mo Littlefield, who is now the executive director of the national Sigma Nu fraternity. Howard Baker once said that there was no group of people more overrepresented in the Senate than those who had been in space. However, it was brought to my attention with the death of Richard Fletcher that 9 percent of the U.S. Senate are members of the Sigma Nu fraternity, with our most prominent member, of course, being the majority leader, GEORGE MITCHELL from Maine. In addition to myself and my colleague from Idaho, Senator MCCLURE, there is also TRENT LOTT from Mississippi, BOB KASTEN from Wisconsin, BOB GRAHAM from Florida, ALAN CRANSTON from California, QUENTIN BURDICK from North Dakota, and LLOYD BENTSEN from Texas.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a very fine article about a fine American, and outstanding Virginian, who had a tremendous impact on the lives of many people.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SIGMA NU FRATERNITY,
Lexington, VA, November 2, 1988.

To Brothers and Friends of Sigma Nu.
From Mo Littlefield, Executive Director.
Subject: Richard Rolston "Dick" Fletcher Joins Chapter Eternal.

Sigma Nu and the entire college fraternity world mourn the loss of one of their greatest architects. On Monday, October 31, 1988, Brother Dick Fletcher unexpectedly ascended to the Chapter Eternal. He was 81.

Born September 19, 1907, the second oldest in a close family of six brothers and a sister, he grew up in Blacksburg, Virginia; Tacoma Park, Maryland; and State College, Pennsylvania, where his father, Stevenson W. Fletcher, was head of the Department of Horticulture, later Dean of Agriculture and Director of Research. In 1924, Brother Dick entered Penn State and became initiated into Sigma Nu as Delta Delta No. 236. A pacesetter from the outset, he inspired four younger brothers to follow him into the Legion of Honor via Delta Delta Chapter: Steve, Peter, Jack and Emmett.

Majoring in English literature and journalism, Brother Fletcher was both a scholar and an all-around athlete. He starred in football, baseball, baseketball and track, while he worked on the campus newspaper and other student publications. Growing up in rural Virginia and Pennsylvania and in the church had taught the "Fletcher boys" a healthy respect for family and neighbors, nature's creatures and growing things. Self-reliance and rugged individualism became a Fletcher trait.

Brother Dick's celebrated life began as an adventure in learning and teaching. He was first lured to newspaper work as a reporter for the Chattanooga Times and soon after became an English teacher and athletic director at Virginia's largest high school, Maury of Norfolk, where as coach of all sports he consistently fielded state championship teams.

He served his country during World War II for three years, two of which included five European campaigns. At his discharge from the U.S. Army, he held the rank of major and had earned the Bronze Star for gallantry.

His tour of military duty interrupted a nineteen-year stint at the University of Virginia where he served as director of first-year athletics, coaching football, basketball and baseball, later as director of admissions, and ultimately as director of student affairs. As dean of students, he engendered national interest, as reported by Time magazine, when he triumphantly defended the honor system of Mr. Jefferson's University. This tenacity to principle caught the eye of Sigma Nu officials, and a year later he was persuaded to assume the position of the Fraternity's General Secretary, upon the retirement of Malcolm Sewell (Beta Kappa) who had served for a quarter of a century.

For the next sixteen years, Brother Fletcher's stardom continued during his leadership over Sigma Nu affairs, earning him perpetual recognition in 1966 as a member of the Fraternity's Hall of Honor. In the tradition of three great progenitors, Walter James Sears (Nu/Beta Nu), John C. Scott (Beta Zeta), and Albert H. "Bert" Wilson (Beta Iota), he shaped and articulated Sigma Nu's noble mission, and his message was contagious. Applying a mastery of the English language, incomparable wit, and eloquence as speaker and writer, he had a profound impact upon the college fraternity movement. With boundless enthusiasm and dedication, he served on numerous interfraternity committees, councils and commissions; became the most sought-after keynote speaker at fraternity convocations; and was quoted widely in fraternity publications. Among his many interfraternity honors were the National Interfraternity Conference Gold Medal awarded in 1977 and the Fraternity Executives Association Distinguished Service Award in 1978.

Retiring from Sigma Nu employment in 1972, he focused his creative energies on the historic community of Lexington and Rockbridge County, serving as the city's first director of visitor relations. He emerged a champion of historic preservation and prime mover in the restoration of area landmarks.

Upon his second retirement, Sigma Nu again pressed him into service to fulfill the dream he had first envisioned in 1956 when he engineered the move of the central office from Indianapolis to Lexington, the birthplace of Sigma Nu. A milestone had occurred in 1969 with the centennial dedication of the wing additions to the headquarters at 9 Lewis Street, but much was left to be accomplished on the development of both the museum and the honor library, the latter of which was fittingly dedicated in his name in 1976. Although Brother Fletcher likened this monumental project to the building of a cathedral, an ongoing enterprise never really finished, as president of the Sigma Nu Educational Foundation, he worked tirelessly to generate the funds needed to achieve the educational mission of the Fraternity. Inspired by his guiding hand as curator of The Headquarters Shrine, the Sigma Nu Foundation acquired adjacent property which opened the window of opportunity for further expansion of the Fletcher dream through the inauguration of a unique leadership development program based upon ethical values. This undertaking began with the restoration of the facility housing the Leadership Development Center and the launching of the Sigma Nu LEAD Program.

The contributions of the Dick Fletcher to Sigma Nu and to the college fraternity movement stand as a monument to the cherished principles of Love, Honor and Truth. Past Regent Herman B. Wells (Beta Eta), Chancellor of Indiana University, said, "I never met a person more able to motivate men toward higher achievement than Dick Fletcher. He has been the paragon of fraternity values and will forever be numbered among the most noble leaders of the fraternity movement."

Regent Robert D. Krestel (Epsilon Rho) commented, "When it comes to men of honor, few can equal the shining example of Dick Fletcher."

President of the Sigma Nu Educational Foundation Robert L. Marchman III (Xi) stated, "We have all lost a great Sigma Nu, a beloved brother and a dear friend."

Those of us who served on Mr. Fletcher's staff now know how Plato must have felt when he lost his revered mentor, Socrates.

Dick Fletcher is survived by his brother Stevenson W. Fletcher, of Kennett Square, Pennsylvania; sister Margaret Fletcher Pierson, of State College, Pennsylvania; his wife Marjorie; son, Dr. John S. Fletcher (Beta) of Williamsburg, Virginia; daughter, Marcia Fletcher Clark, of Portland, Oregon; six grandchildren and five great grandchildren.

Expressions of condolence may be sent to Sigma Nu Headquarters, Box 1869, Lexington, VA 24450, where they will be hand delivered to Mrs. Fletcher.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

WISCONSIN WILL BENEFIT FROM A FEDERAL CAPITAL GAINS TAX CUT

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I believe the case for a capital gains tax cut should focus on results. These results can be measured in terms of new investment and new jobs. In 1978 and 1981, we cut the capital gains rate by more than half. Investment in new companies boomed. This helped spark the creation of over 19 million new jobs in this decade.

In my home State of Wisconsin, we have had tangible results from a low State capital gains tax rate. Wisconsin is one of the few States that retained the 60-percent exclusion of long-term capital gains from taxable income after Congress eliminated the Federal exclusion when it overhauled the tax system in 1986. And as a result of this low State capital gains tax, the Milwaukee Sentinel said that "Wisconsin enjoys the lowest unemployment rate in 15 years" and "the perception of Wisconsin being friendly to business is improved by this important enhancement of the investment climate."

Wisconsin has taken a positive, first step toward stimulating more investment in newly emerging small businesses and creating more new jobs for the future. But I believe we can and must do more by reducing the high Federal capital gains tax. Our high capital gains rate, practically the highest in the world, puts American workers and businesses at a severe competitive disadvantage with our major trading partners—many of whom do not tax capital gains at all. Cutting the U.S. capital gains rate in half would put us on a more level playing field with our overseas competitors. More importantly, this one step would move Wisconsin's and the entire Nation's economy into even higher gear.

Recently, I was joined by business leaders from 22 high-growth Wisconsin firms to send a public message: Wisconsin stands to hit the economic and employment jackpot if the Federal tax rate on capital gains is reduced. And everyone in our State—from business to labor, from young people to the elderly, from the single person to the family of 10—stands to gain from the economic growth a capital gains tax cut would spark in Wisconsin.

I highly recommend to my Senate colleagues a recent policy paper by the nonpartisan, nonprofit Public Expenditure Research Foundation in Madison, WI on the capital gains issue. The foundation study found that a low Federal capital gains tax would bring substantial economic benefits to Wisconsin and to the rest of the Nation. Specifically, a capital gains tax cut would encourage investors to realize gains, freeing capital for new investment; stimulate entrepreneurial activity; increase tax collections; encourage investment in new and emerging businesses; and improve the Nation's competitiveness for foreign investment.

I urge my colleagues to support this effort to bring more growth, more jobs and more opportunity to all Americans.

I ask unanimous consent that a copy of a letter signed by the Wisconsin business leaders to President Bush expressing support for efforts to reduce capital gains taxes, a copy of Public Expenditure Research Foundation's "Wisconsin Issues" and the Milwaukee Sentinel's editorial of February 2 be entered into the RECORD:

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 15, 1989.

Hon. GEORGE BUSH,
The President,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: As representatives of Wisconsin businesses committed to economic growth and job creation, we want to express our strong support for your efforts and those of U.S. Senator Bob Kasten to seek a reduction in the current tax rate on capital gains.

We believe a lower capital gains tax rate would help create jobs, spur investment and growth, boost family incomes, and help Wisconsin compete more effectively in world markets.

With your and Senator Kasten's leadership, we can keep the U.S. economy on the right track in creating jobs and opportunity for all. A capital gains tax cut is a big step in the right direction.

Respectfully,

WISCONSIN ISSUES

TIME FOR A CHANGE, LOW FEDERAL CAPITAL GAINS TAXES SHOW BIG ADVANTAGES

A long-term disagreement over how capital gains should be taxed continues in the nation's capital and financial centers. And most recently the debate has centered on a proposal to reduce the maximum tax on capital gains to 15% from its current 33% level.

Capital gains occur when capital assets are sold for more than their original purchase price. Capital assets include property owned and used for personal purposes or investments such as a home, stocks, bonds, land, and commodities such as gold or silver. For example, you would net a capital gain if you sold your home for more than you paid for it, even if the increase in value was due to inflation.

CAPITAL GAINS TAXATION HISTORY

From 1922 to 1986 long-term capital gains (gains held more than one year) were given preferential treatment under federal tax law and were taxed at rates lower than those applied to short-term gains and ordinary income (wages and salaries).

Prior to 1978 half of all long-term gains were excluded from taxable income and the remainder taxed at a rate of 49%. In 1978 the late U.S. Representative William Steiger of Wisconsin led the fight to lower capital gains taxes by promoting the idea that high tax rates stifle economic productivity.

In 1978, at Steiger's urging, Congress cut the capital gains tax rate to a maximum of 28% while increasing the exclusion amount to 60%. Subsequently the maximum tax rate was cut to 20% in 1981.

The Tax Reform Act of 1986 reversed that trend by enacting the largest capital gains tax rate increase in history. Although ordinary income tax rates were reduced, the act also eliminated many tax preferences, including the 60% exclusion for long-term capital gains.

Under the 1986 Act both long-term and short-term capital gains are taxed as ordinary income and rated at a maximum rate of 33%. (See table)

REDUCED TAX BENEFITS ECONOMY

Proponents of a capital gains tax cut argue that it would stimulate the economy and create jobs while increasing tax collections.

Capital gains play an important part in an individual's willingness to invest in new business, and high taxation of gains discourages this type of investment.

Investors risk short-term capital outlays in new and emerging businesses in the anticipation that long-term profits will prove greater than dividends from their current investments. But faced with high capital gains taxes, investors may choose to maintain current investments and avoid taxation of capital gains from those investments.

Comparisons of public stock offerings for 1978 to 1983 indicate that enterpreneurial activity in the economy surged during this five-year period of lower capital gains taxation.

In addition, the Wall Street Journal reports that some investors are reluctant to invest in the stock market because of high capital gains taxes. For many, stock market risks outweigh possible benefits when government taxes will take one-third of every dollar gained.

GOOD PUBLIC POLICY WHY THE U.S. NEEDS A CAPITAL GAINS TAX CUT

Encourages investors to realize gains, freezing capital for new investment

Stimulates entrepreneurial activity

Increases tax collections

Encourages investment in new and emerging businesses

Improves the nation's competitiveness for foreign investment

LOCKED-IN GAINS

High capital gains taxes not only discourage risk-taking investments but lock investors in to their current investments. Since capital gains are taxed only when gains are realized (assets are sold), investors have some control over when (if at all) they pay capital gains taxes. If they know capital gains will be taxed at a high rate, investors can and often do retain their capital assets—"locking in" their investment indefinitely.

Economists are concerned that locked-in investments could lead to a misallocation of capital in the economy. When asset sales are inhibited, the investment of anticipated gains from those sales is blocked.

The result is a stagnation of capital assets—funds are locked in to older investments and are not available for new investment opportunities. This prevents any economic activity that might have been stimulated by new investment.

The only sure way for investors to avoid taxation on capital gains is to retain their assets and pass them on to their heirs upon death. An asset held in this manner is not taxed as a capital gain. This solution, however, continues to remove capital from further circulation in the economy.

JUMP IN REALIZATIONS

The view that a high tax rate causes investments to be locked in is held by many in the financial and economic communities, including former secretaries of the U.S. Treasury, academic professors, and former members of the President's Council of Economic Advisors.

The lock-in theory holds that a reduction in the capital gains tax rate will increase the realization of capital gains. The large chart below presents a look at the realization of capital gains in the U.S. from 1970 to 1986.

Capital gains realizations increased significantly in 1979 and 1982—the years immediately following the capital gains tax cuts of 1978 and 1981. And preliminary data for 1986 show that realizations of gains more than doubled as investors anticipated the increase in taxes effective for 1987.

CHANGES IN TAX COLLECTIONS

Tax collections from capital gains are linked to the amount of gains realized by taxpayers. As gain realizations rise tax collections also increase.

A review of the small inside chart below (showing collections from capital gains taxation for 1970 to 1985), presents some interesting trends. Capital gains tax collections remained fairly constant during the early 1970s—years of high inflation—but began an upward climb in 1978 when the tax rate was cut to 28% with a 60% exclusion.

The period following the 1981 capital gains tax rate cut (from 28% to 20%) saw an additional marked increase in the amount of tax collections.

High capital gains taxes discourage entrepreneurial activity. MIT economics professor Paul Samuelson put it best: "You cannot tax the results of old innovation without somewhat affecting the prospects of an as-yet-unborn innovation." If innovators are not allowed to reap the rewards of their work, innovation is not likely to occur.

TAX HIGH INTERNATIONALLY

Proponents of a capital gains tax cut also point to the United States' high rate of taxation in comparison to other developed and developing nations.

The U.S. currently taxes long-term capital gains at a higher rate than all of its European and Asian competitors, and taxes short-term gains at a higher rate than all but two of them. (See table below).

Reducing the nation's tax on capital gains would encourage foreign investment in the U.S. and help its competitiveness overseas.

The average marginal rate for taxation of capital gains will increase 134 percent (from its 1986 level) by 1989 under changes enacted in the Tax Reform Act of 1986.

BROAD-BASED TAX EFFECT

Opponents of a capital gains tax cut argue that the tax affects only the rich, dismissing the impact the tax has on all taxpayers. In a 1973 study of the sale of capital assets, the U.S. Treasury found that low and middle income taxpayers paid a much higher effective tax rate on gains than did upper income taxpayers even though upper income taxpayers faced higher statutory rates.

This highlights one of the problems with the capital gains tax. The taxpayer is taxed on the increased value of the asset even though the increase may be due to inflation.

Harvard economist Lawrence Lindsey has estimated the change in capital gains tax rates by income group from 1986 to 1989–91. As shown in the table above, the 1986 Tax Reform Act actually increased tax rates most significantly for the lower income groups.

The capital gains tax weighs more heavily upon the middle and lower income groups since in many instances they may not be able to time the realization of their gains (unlike higher income individuals). Taxpayers in all income groups would benefit from a reduction in the capital gains tax.

TAXPAYER REACTION TO TAX LAW CHANGES

Since Congress reduced the capital gains tax in 1978, a variety of studies have attempted to relate taxpayer behavior to tax law changes. The National Bureau of Economic Research, the Brookings Institute, the U.S. Treasury, and the Congressional Budget Office have all done work in this area.

Some of the common findings of these studies include: increases in tax rates discourage realizations of capital gains; higher income groups are more responsive to tax rate changes; individuals with gains in stocks are more sensitive to changes in tax rates than those with gains in other types of assets; and gains are more likely to be realized in the first year following a tax reduction.

The major area of disagreement between proponents and opponents of a change in the capital gains tax rate is the long-term effect rate changes have on taxpayer behavior.

Experts disagree on how taxpayers' realization of long-term gains over the long run (more than one year) is affected by changes in tax rates. The practical outcome of this disagreement is the difference in projected tax collections under the proposal to reduce the capital gains tax to 15%.

Opponents of a capital gains tax rate reduction contend that reducing the tax to 15% would result in a drop in tax collections. Proponents counter that such a reduction would instead result in collection increases. How is it possible that the two groups can come to such divergent conclusions?

The answer lies in their treatment of taxpayer activity in economic models used to estimate tax collections. Opponents of a tax cut use a static model, which assumes that taxpayers make no adjustments in the timing of their gain realizations beyond the first year of a change in the tax rate.

Estimates by tax cut proponents are based on a dynamic model which assumes that taxpayers do make adjustments in their realizations beyond one year. The dynamic model takes into account the fact that as taxes decrease the taxpayer will have an ongoing incentive to realize gains more frequently—resulting in the generation of more tax collections.

The dynamic model also notes the broader effect of a tax reduction. Even if collections from taxation of capital gains declined as a result of a tax cut, the decline would be offset by a rise in the collection of other taxes due to the economic activity generated by investment of realized gains.

A recent U.S. Treasury report found that the tax rate reductions in 1978 and 1981 increased tax collections by $4.7 billion—a strong case for the accuracy of the dynamic model.

WISCONSIN'S TAXATION OF CAPITAL GAINS

Until the mid-1980s Wisconsin treated all capital gains, both long-term and short-term, as ordinary income taxed under the state's income tax.

But following the recommendations of a 1979 study by the Public Expenditure Survey (see discussion below right) the Wisconsin legislature provided for a 60% exclusion of long-term capital gains from taxable income. This "federalization" of the state tax law was phased in over a three-year period until exclusions reached the 60% level in 1984.

Now Wisconsin has maintained the 60% exclusion although the federal government dropped a similar provision from the federal tax code as a result of the Tax Reform Act of 1986.

Although attempts have been made in the state legislature to reduce or eliminate the exclusion (most recently in the 1987–88 budget), the 60% level has been maintained by the stroke of the Governor's veto pen.

Wisconsin is currently among only ten states that tax 40% of long-term capital gains.

As shown in the table at right, 27 states have joined the federal government in taxing all long-term capital gains. One state each taxes 60% and 50% of long-term gains, while 10 states tax only 40%.

Eleven states impose no tax on capital gains income.

SURVEY LEADS THE FIGHT

In the 1970s the Public Expenditure Survey led the fight to reduce Wisconsin's high rate of capital gains taxation. In 1979 the Survey published a study entitled Wisconsin's Taxation of Capital Gains: Fair? Progressive? Competitive? The study was a joint effort by the Survey's research staff and University of Wisconsin-Madison business professor Dr. Jon Udell.

In an examination of capital gains taxes paid in the state in 1976, the study concluded that all of Wisconsin's citizens were affected by the tax. Survey research staff found that most capital gains in Wisconsin were realized by low and middle income taxpayers, refuting the argument that capital gains taxes affect only the rich.

The study further found that the state's high capital gains taxes (second highest in the nation at that time) discouraged investment in the state. This disincentive to invest in turn resulted in the loss of potential jobs and tax revenues for Wisconsin.

In addition, the study demonstrated that capital gains taxation discriminates against in-state investors in Wisconsin industry. For example, a Florida resident investing in a Wisconsin company pays no state tax on a capital gain from that investment, but a Wisconsin resident with a similar gain will pay state tax on the gain.

Finally, Survey researchers found inflation to be the primary factor in the increase in value of most capital gains. Thus individuals who hold capital assets for a long period of time (such as the elderly) are hit especially hard by capital gains taxation.

BUSH COULD LOOK TO STATE FOR ADVICE

Members of Congress who are still smarting from the loss of a pay raise they backed away from under public pressure can be expected to try and get back in good grace with the voters by attacking President Bush's proposal for a capital gains tax cut as a break for the rich.

Perhaps Wisconsin Gov. Tommy G. Thompson should get on the phone to the president and describe his successful effort to retain the exclusion from state taxation of 60% of capital gains income.

Thompson managed to stave off a stampede by Democrats to "federalize" the state law on such taxes by adopting a change in the "simplified" tax reform program passed by Congress that required capital gains income to be considered as ordinary income.

Former Gov. Anthony S. Earl strongly suggested that there was hardly any alternative and that the state was entitled to the tax "windfall" which would accrue.

Thompson said "the heck you say," and rode to victory on a platform that backed the break on the ground that it would stimulate investment and create jobs in Wisconsin.

Today, despite the exodus from Wisconsin of several businesses during the past administration and a big deal Thompson forged with Chrysler Corp. that didn't work out, Wisconsin enjoys its lowest unemployment rate in 15 years.

Skeptics will argue that a direct link cannot be traced from higher employment to the low capital gains tax, but Thompson's administration has called the provision an arrow in his quiver in the battle against the competition for industrial jobs.

Certainly, the perception of Wisconsin as being friendly to business is improved by this important enhancement of the investment climate.

Bush, of course, can point to experience at the national level in trying to sell his idea.

After the late Rep. William A. Steiger (R-Wis.) helped lead a fight to adopt a capital gains tax exclusion in the 1970s, revenues did rise because of increased activity.

What such a break actually does in the long run is to promote the movement of investment to the best-managed companies. In the process, the entire economy is strengthened.

Toward that end, Bush's plan is especially far-sighted. For one year, it would permit the tax break on investments held for one year. That would promote an initial burst of revenue.

Afterward, the break would be applied to gains held for a longer period to ensure stability.

Even shortsighted lawmakers should see the wisdom in this strategy.

PROPER USE OF PUBLIC LANDS

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, there has been much discussion both in committee and on the floor in recent years about what is or is not a proper use of our vast public land base.

As usual, when interest groups become highly polarized over natural resource issues, it often becomes difficult for the general public to sort fact from fiction.

A recent speech by Mr. Daniel Goldy to the Associated Oregon Loggers does an excellent job of summing up the current situation in Oregon. Virtually every public land State faces the same crisis Mr. Goldy defines for exactly the same reasons.

The Congress and media are quick to climb on board the latest environmental bandwagon; often without searching out the actual facts. They simply take at face value—and then repeat—whatever material environmental organizations choose to provide them with.

Votes on such issues are easy politically for those with little or no public lands in their State. They have nothing to lose—no jobs, no industry, no funding for education or funds to maintain county roads. The same is not true for the men and women in scores of small communities throughout Oregon, Idaho, and other predominently Western States.

I hope my colleagues will take the time to read Mr. Goldy's comments.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the complete text of Mr. Goldy's January 14, 1989, presentation to the Associated Oregon Loggers Convention be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOGGERS AND LUMBERMEN: A THREATENED AND ENDANGERED SPECIES

About 41 years ago—in Eugene—I had my introduction to Oregon's forest issues when I came out as a very young Deputy Asst. Secretary of Interior to hold hearings on the O&C Lands.

I learned that Oregon was unique in possessing the outstanding forest resources of any state in the U.S.; that Oregon alone has more commercial timber than all of the states of the South; that the forests are to Oregon's economy what oil, gas and coal are to other states; what the automobile industry is to Michigan; or what the sun and climate is to the southern states. I learned that Oregon's forest resources could, if managed correctly, provide a permanent foundation of economic prosperity under the State's economy. But because such a large percentage of the forest resources (more than any other state in the U.S.) is in Federal ownership, Oregon's economy is really dependent on decisions made in Washington, DC.

The intervening years remind one of the old serial movie thriller, "The Perils of Pauline." The wood products industry heroine is always about to perish at the end of each serial only to be saved by the hero in the nick of time. But because all the past forest crises were related to markets (which went up and down like a roller coaster), no matter how bad things got, one could be optimistic that the good times would eventually return. As a consequence, companies would invest in better mills and equipment and be ready to ride the next wave of prosperity.

Today the issues are different. We are not confronting a collapse of the wood products markets. On the contrary, the market prospects are good for the indefinite future. This is why so few have grasped that enormity of the economic disaster that is in the offing.

The problem today—unlike any time in the past—is timber supply. The prospect is that Oregon's forest products industry will be put to death because the radical environmentalists have devised the legal means to stop federal timber sales. And that is just what they are doing.

Unless new federal legislation is enacted to correct the problem, there will be more wood products mills closed in Oregon by the end of 1989 than were closed in the depths of the 1981-82 depression. Unemployment rates will soar to 20% levels in timber dependent counties. And I would remind the residents of the Portland Metropolitan area, many of whom finance and cheer on the radical environmentalists, that in 1981-82 when the wood products industry last collapsed, the unemployment rate exceeded 12% in the Portland area. Oregon's economy is inter-dependent and there is no immunity or hiding place for anyone if the largest generator of gross state product—the wood products industry—is deliberately destroyed.

The Oregon counties which receive a share of revenues from O&C and national forest lands will be looking at—by the end of this year—losses in annual federal timber receipts of $85 to $100 million per year. In addition they will suffer losses from reduced severance tax receipts and property taxes as mills close.

The state's budget—which is about to undergo the biennial tug of war between the Governor and the Legislators—and between groups of Legislators—will be rendered meaningless by the shrinkage of revenues and the skyrocketing of welfare costs. I personally agree with the Governor's Children's Agenda, and the need for more expenditures for mental health, health care, education and state infrastructure. But we will be facing budget cutbacks, not increases, if the wood products industry closes down.

One of the ironies: the hopes of the Governor and many Legislators to use the revenues arising from today's current prosperity (based on a resurgent wood products industry) to bolster the universities, like the University of Oregon here in Eugene, will be dashed on the rocks of state-wide depression. And who will have been in the vanguard of those orchestrating the state-wide economic collapse? None other than students and professors at the University of Oregon who are leaders in the radical environmentalist movement. Perhaps when that occurs, the President of the University of Oregon will look at the Environmental Law Institute—which filed the O&C spotted owl suit—and come to a different conclusion about how appropriate is its mission and whether Oregon's taxpayers should be financing a group whose objective is to destroy the economic foundation of the state.

I would like now to spend a few minutes to describe how we came to this situation whereby a small group of radical environmentalists can shut down the state's economy. Some 40 years ago when I became Regional Administrator of the BLM and the O&C Lands, the issue was conservation—how we could perpetuate our forest resources for a sustained yield so as to put a permanent economic foundation under the timber dependent communities.

The environmentalists of that era were conservationists. They believed in wise and prudent use of our basic resources. We were all on the same side.

Today the radical environmentalists are no longer conservationists. They are "preservationists." They want to lock up our forest resources and throw the key away. They do not care about the state and its communities; they are not interested in community stability or preserving the economic base. Indeed, they care not a whit about people or what happens to them—they want total control over the national forests and other federal forests; they want to stop all logging. Some of them prefer to kill loggers with spikes in trees than to have a tree cut.

Lest you think I am overstating—I was told by the Chief of the U.S. Forest Service that the environmentalist organizations in Washington, D.C. have served notice of their intention to introduce legislation into the new Congress to recharter the Forest Service. The purpose of the new charter would be to ban logging in the national forests. The rationale for this initiative is that the globe is endangered by the depletion of the ozone layer and the consequent greenhouse effect, and therefore no more trees should be cut in federal forests.

The scientific facts are that young growing trees put oxygen into the air and take out carbon dioxide; whereas the old growth (or ancient forests) the environmentalists want to preserve, do just the opposite. The decaying old Douglas fir produces carbon dioxide and takes oxygen out of the air. The solution to the ozone problem would appear to be to accelerate the harvest of old growth and increase by a factor of 2 or 3 the rate of replanting to young vigorously growing forests.

Note that the first big confrontation with the radical environmentalists was over wilderness. They wanted all areas of the national forest to which the roads had not yet been extended to be placed in permanent wilderness designations. They created enough of a ruckus to produce two RARE (Roadless Area Review and Evaluation) studies by the U.S.F.S. After the second study, then President Carter sent his recommendations to Congress. Here in Oregon it called for adding 416,000 national forest acres to the existing 1.1 million acres of wilderness. When the bill was passed late in the session in 1984 it actually contained more than one million acres rather than the 416,000 that the RARE II study had recommended. This was the consequence of the environmentalists putting so much heat on Oregon's Congressional delegation that they capitulated.

When the Oregon Wilderness Bill was signed, the wood products industry was told by the Congressional delegation that while the wilderness reservations might have been excessive, it was worth it to secure the "release" of the rest of the national forests for development. The term of art here is the word "release". The legislation contained release language which was supposed to bar further consideration of wilderness reservations through the 15 years of the next planning cycle, by which time there presumably would be no non-wilderness roadless areas to fight about.

But our Congressmen were wrong. The day the Wilderness Bill was signed, the Oregon Natural Resources Council put out a press release announcing they would now proceed with an all-out drive to lock up the rest of the forests in wilderness—but this time they would call it something else, such as "reservations for wildlife", "scenic viewsheds", "old growth ecosystems", "watersheds", etc.

And so was born the battle over the northern spotted owl. To anyone who takes the time to look at the facts, it is clear that the real issue is not northern spotted owls. Indeed, once the argument began, spotted owls were located everywhere, including in young second growth, in higher altitudes, in old car bodies in Eastern Oregon. Most of the owl have been found along logging roads, but few were located deep in the virgin old growth that is supposed to be their required habitat. All one has to do is look at the maps.

Then it was acknowledged by the environmentalists that the spotted owls really weren't the issue. What they wanted was to lock up the old growth. At the Environmental Law Clinic at the U. of O. Law School, March, 1988, the environmentalists said the owl was a "surrogate" for what they were after; that if they hadn't stumbled on the owl, they would have had to genetically engineer one to accomplish their purposes.

At that Law Clinic, the environmentalists also spelled out their strategy with respect to appeals. They indicated that they would win—even if they lost on the merits after litigation of their appeals—provided they could get the Ninth Circuit to issue a stay on timber sales pending a final decision. Their objective was to eliminate the wood products industry by withholding timber needed for current operations. This accounts for the across-the-board appeals filed in certain national forests. At one point they filed 279 appeals in one or two days.

Of course they have not explained to the Ninth Circuit Court what kind of game they are playing, so that Court has issued a stay on timber sales in old growth O&C forest within a 2.1 mile radius of any spotted owl location pending final resolution of environmentalist appeals. The BLM has announced they are withdrawing about one-third of their planned timber sales for the current fiscal year because there is no way they can be sold and awarded in the face of the Ninth Circuit's stay. I was very pleased to see that Governor Goldschmidt has joined with industry and the Association of O&C Counties in a motion urging the Ninth Circuit Court to lift its injunction. If the Ninth Circuit refuses to do so, the issue will be appealed to the Supreme Court.

It is interesting to note how little the environmentalists really care about wildlife except as a device to lock up the forests. Andy Stahl, who was the Chief Forester for the U.S. Wildlife Federation here in Eugene (but is now working for the Legal Defense Fund of the Sierra Club in Seattle) went to Saskatchewan, Canada, in 1985 to address the Wildlife Federation there. He urged the group to "Mine out their forests"—to liquidate them—to take the money and run—and to set aside any notions of sustained yield. His motives were clear enough; to get the Canadians to further overcut their forests so as to drive the industry out of business here in the U.S.-Pacific Northwest with subsidized lumber exports. But one has to ask: why has he no concern for the wildlife in Canadian forests?

When the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service concluded for the second time that the northern spotted owl was neither threatened nor endangered, the environmentalists were momentarily non-plussed. But they soon came up with the marbled murrelet as the next bird that required old growth forests. What is clear is that so long as the objective is to lock up the forests and put the wood products industry out of business, they will never run out of wildlife species as surrogates. If one species is finally litigated, they will be ready with another.

So here we have the environmentalists blocking timber sales on the basis of spotted owl preservation when they have publicly acknowledged that their real goal is to lock up the "old growth"—or as they now say, because they think it has more public relations appeal—to lock up the "ancient forests". But as all of us know, the old growth can't be preserved. Old growth Douglas fir gradually dies, and if nature does not renew the forest with fires, blowdown or insect infestations, it is gradually replaced with hemlock or some other less desirable species.

Nothing reveals more clearly the distorted values of the environmentalists than their efforts to prevent the salvage of the fire-killed timber in the North Kalmiopsis area—the devastating Silver Fire that occurred in the fall of 1987. Although it is not a wilderness area, (half the fire was in the Kalmiopsis Wilderness) the environmentalists prefer the bugs get the fire damaged timber in the North Kalmiopsis rather than have it salvaged for use by people and have the area replanted.

Thus far I have not mentioned the new Forest Plans being prepared by the U.S.F.S. and the B.L.M. As you are all aware, the U.S.F.S. bowed to the pressures of the environmentalists, and in their preliminary drafts they came up with preferred alternatives that would reduce levels of annual harvests by about 21% in Oregon and Washington—but closer to 34% in the national forests of Western Oregon. These new proposed plans are full of technical errors that understate the amount of timber available on a sustained yield basis. But perhaps worse, the plans arbitrarily adopt "minimum management requirements" with no public input pursuant to which vast acreages have been set aside for non-timber purposes.

The industry has been getting ready to challenge these plans on both legal and technical grounds. Studies of the technical issues have convinced the industry that even if all the additional acreage were set aside for the MMRs, the Forest Service could maintain the sales levels under existing plans if only they would run the computers correctly and add up the figures accurately.

We had been told that even if there were some flaws in the plans, it would be best to have them adopted as soon as possible—and to correct mistakes later. This is because without the new plans there would be no way to get into the non-wilderness roadless areas in the face of environmentalists' appeals; and timber sales would grind to a halt if the only option was to continue to overcut in the presently roaded areas. The USFS also assumed that the plans would resolve other contentious issues with regard to wildlife, riparian zones, scenic watersheds, etc.

This is the assumption the State of Oregon has been proceeding on in its quest for an Oregon alternative.

But that assumption has been blown apart by the success of the environmentalists in blocking timber sales with appeals in national forests where final plans have been adopted. Mills are closing as timber sales are stayed by the Ninth Circuit in Montana and Idaho where the Forest Service thought their new plans would give them clear sailing.

To understand all this, it is necessary to look at the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals. The industry has joined the U.S. Government in an appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court to reverse the Ninth Circuit on some decisions which are regarded as totally improper under the law, and where the court is accused of substituting its judgments for the technical judgments on substantive matters of government agencies and administrators charged by law with making such decisions. In effect we have the Ninth Circuit judges substituting themselves for the Regional Forester, the Director of the BLM, and the Chief Engineer of the Corps of Engineers in making highly technical judgments.

The environmentalists have seized on two specific interpretations or biases evident in Ninth Circuit decisions: One relates to how site specific an environmental impact statement or environmental assessment accompanying a timber sale plan or program must be to be acceptable. To date no EIS or EA has been sufficiently site specific to be acceptable, and unless this is changed by the U.S. Supreme Court or by legislation, it appears that every federal timber sale that the environmentalists choose to appeal will require a full-blown EIS. Such an EIS is so expensive and time consuming that for all practical purposes, the timber sales program would grind to a halt.

Note that the EIS the Forest Service prepared for the Silver Fire cost more than $2 million, took about 8 months to prepare, and sales would probably still be blocked on appeal had Congress not passed legislation eliminating court appeals in this case. Congress did this because the bugs would have consumed the timber; thereby resolving the issue in favor of the environmentalists while the court was deliberating.

The other issue utilized to block timber sales in Ninth Circuit appeals is "cumulative impact." The environmentalists argue that it is not enough to look at the timber proposed for sale in relation to the plan and program adopted for that national forest, but it must also be evaluated in relation to everything else that has or may happen in that timbershed under private and other public ownerships. Thus, if the Ninth Circuit, in its forestry judgment, concludes that some private owner has cut too much of his timber in the timbershed, it might then stop the Forest Service from selling its timber because that would create too much cumulative impact.

By now it should be clear that the "site specific" requirements and the "cumulative impact" requirements are at odds with each other. One requires a very narrow focus on a small number of acres; the other requires a view of the entire timbershed. The combination makes it possible to block almost any federal timber sale anywhere—absent legislation to correct it. Without such legislation the new forest plans are meaningless. All they would do is impose additional ceilings and limits on timber sales, but they could not guarantee that any timber would be sold pursuant to the plans.

This then is where we are and how we got here. Before concluding, there are a few loose ends I should take care of. I have said that absent remedial legislation, Oregon's wood products industry would be in dire straits—with much of it shut down—by the end of 1989. What happens in the meantime?

The industry came out of last year's drought and severe fire season short of logs. As you know, when the weather eased, logging resumed at full speed. Nevertheless some mills have laid off shifts; others have closed because of log shortages. This will continue. When spring comes there will be another upswing in logging. But backlogs of timber under contract are rapidly shrinking in the face of record high harvests from BLM and national forest lands.

We have already noted the BLM announcement of a one-third cutback in sales this fiscal year given the constraints of the stay issued by the Ninth Circuit on the owl case. The Regional Office of the USFS has told us they expect at least one-fourth of scheduled sales this fiscal year won't be sold because of environmentalists' appeals. Because the backlog of timber sales on the shelf ready to be offered resulting from the timber contract buy-back program has been exhausted, the USFS no longer has any way to substitute other sales for those held up on appeals.

Actually it appears the fall down on Forest Service sales will be substantially more than the one-fourth estimated. At this rate timber backlogs will disappear during 1989 and by the end of the year few if any companies will have a log supply.

In the meantime the shrinking timber supply is driving up timber prices and putting a squeeze on the mills. Their delivered log costs are rising much faster than end product prices. This is the kind of squeeze that threatened most mills with bankruptcy in 1983 and 1984.

What about the companies' private timber? Most of the private industrial timber is young second growth. Good forest management would suggest it be allowed to grow while concentrating on harvesting dead and dying old growth. But with federal timber under increasing constraints, the private industrial young second growth is being harvested at an accelerated rate. Some of it is going into export as logs and some is being used to postpone the eventual day when the mills close for lack of raw material.

I am all in favor of banning raw log exports, particularly when the industry is about to be shut down for lack of logs. But let's not be confused. The federal forests have more than 75% of the commercial timber and log exports are banned from these forests. What will close down the industry and shut down the county revenues is environmentalists' blocking federal timber sales.

This premature liquidation of the young second growth is exactly what the environmentalists have been advocating. They have sought by every means to stop the harvesting of old growth and have urged mills to convert to processing young second growth. To the extent the environmentalists succeed, it spells the end of a forest industry in Oregon. Lock up the old growth and liquidate the second growth and that is the end of sustained yield and a perpetual forest. Nature will in due course liquidate the old growth and then there will be nothing but a 70-100 year renewal period.

Not to worry, the environmentalists say. Let's put the national forests into new parks and live off tourism. Oregon has long enjoyed a burgeoning tourist industry which helps supplement incomes from basic industries like wood products. But Oregon already suffers from a sub-standard per capita income (some $1400 below the national average) because of the loss of high wage jobs in basic industries and the substitution of low wage jobs in trade and services (including tourism). Oregonians need jobs on which to raise and support a family, not more minimum wage jobs which can't get people out of poverty.

Moreover, there is no evidence to suggest that the destruction of wood products jobs in order to create new national parks will create more jobs than were lost. Indeed the experience with the Redwoods National Park in California suggests just the opposite.

And speaking of jobs, we have heard a great deal in the past couple of years of how Oregon should promote more secondary manufacturing of wood products. It is, of course, true that millwork plants that manufacture doors, windows, shutters, mouldings, furniture stock and the like are labor intensive in relation to raw material inputs. Such plants are the mainstays of communities like Bend, Madras and Klamath Falls—to name but a few. What is not understood is that those millwork plants use the material produced from old growth logs. Lock up the old growth and you not only put the primary producers out of business but also the millwork plants.

And finally, what about the Wilderness Society study by Jeffrey Olson which is widely quoted by environmentalists to the effect that even if the old growth is not locked up, the wood products industry is slated to lose 34,700 jobs in the next 4 decades? They argue that if all the old growth is set aside it would only mean a loss of an additional 2300 jobs in Oregon by the year 2030.

As an economist I can tell you the Olson analysis is total nonsense. It ranks with the Wilderness Society assertion at a recent Portland City Club meeting that environmentalist appeals of timber sales have not cost one worker his job in Oregon.

The essential fallacy in Olson's economics is that he projected the enormous increases in productivity that occurred in the wood products industry in 1981-83 on a straight line basis to 2030. He ignores the facts that those investments were a one time catch-up to bring processing costs down to a level whereby the industry could process the timber it had under contract. In some cases mill productivity increased by 62%. But what mill owner in his right mind would invest in new plant and equipment today with the timber supply disappearing? And most mills have already installed the best of the new technology. Moreover, if the old growth is locked up, and the second growth is liquidated, employment in the wood products industry wouldn't be gradually reduced. It would be wiped out.

I know it is difficult for Oregonians who are enjoying a sense of prosperity and basking in the glow of an Oregon comeback to believe that there is any big problem down the road. Most Oregonians are not sufficiently versed in economics to know that the comeback and the current prosperity is based on the resurgence of the wood products industry. But unless they awake to the realities they will find that the comeback will become a fall-back; and that we will be right back in the economic morass we experienced in 1981 and 1982. Only this time there will be no wood products industry to pull the state's economy out of the glue.

The issue of the spotted owl—like the snail darter episode before it—teaches us that the federal law on threatened and endangered species needs to be amended. If the owl is listed by the federal courts, it alone will cost this region's wood products industry more than 2 billion board feet of sales per year.

When and if the law is amended, it is time that provision be made so that loggers and lumbermen can be listed. We are the real endangered species.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the hour of 10:30 having arrived, the Senate will now go into executive session to resume the consideration of the nomination of John G. Tower to be Secretary of Defense; which the clerk will state.

The assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of John Goodwin Towers of Texas, to be Secretary of Defense.

Mr. SYMMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I wish to speak at length on the nomination of John Tower, but I will do that at a later date.

I spent a great deal of time yesterday watching the debate as it happened and reviewed a lot of it last night.

I listened to some fine speeches yesterday. Again, I appeal to some of our colleagues in the Democratic Party that there might be five of them who would come forward and vote for this qualified, capable man, John Tower, as Secretary of Defense. It is very obvious the confirmation debate is going to be very partisan. It probably will be as bloody as any debates that have been held on this Senate floor since the Civil War. It does not befit the Senate well to have this debate so obviously partisan.

I know that my Democrat colleagues on the floor will say it is not partisan. However, they are going to have a hard time making it stick unless we can get four or five of them to vote for Senator Tower. I invite my colleagues to read yesterday morning's Washington Times story about booze and sex on Capitol Hill. If they do not think they are opening Pandora's box, I think this will be a grievous mistake.

I urge my colleagues, before it gets any more rank, any more acrimonious, any more uncivil, that some of them think it through. One of our distinguished Senators, whom I consider to be a friend of mine, gave a glowing speech on the qualifications of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense, and then at the end of the speech said, "But in good conscience, I cannot vote for him."

Now, it seems to me either John Tower is qualified or he is not qualified. The calls are coming into my office, why are the Democrats doing this? Have they held a caucus meeting and decided it would be the party position to dump Tower?

For what gain I have not figured out. But I will speak on this issue later. It is Friday. The acrimony has not broken completely out into the open so that it is out of hand at this point. I appeal to my colleagues on the other side of the aisle who have kept their minds open on this issue to come forward now.

Senator BENTSEN has already given Senator Tower a glowing endorsement before the committee. I do not think he has made a public statement of what his intention is to do on the Senate floor, but I think three or four Democrats coming out in favor of Senator Tower would be a good start for today. We might end the debate next week and then get on to other important subjects like the budget.

We have seen interest rates go up in the last couple of months. The Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board repeatedly states before different committees in Congress, that we need to get busy and resolve the budget questions so the markets will know what we are going to do this year. That is the best way to dampen any further increases in inflation or any further increases in interest rate pressure upward. Coming from the Western part of the country, Mr. President, high interest rates mean a slower economy; a slower economy means more troubles with respect to the Federal budget.

It means more hurt and pain to the working men and women of America. What this Congress needs to do is to focus our attention on the things we can do something about. President Bush was elected President of the United States. He selected his choice to be Secretary of Defense. I have not heard Senators say that Senator Tower was not capable. If you read the statements of Senators who have voiced disapproval of him, it is very interesting through previous statements in support of Senator Tower. As recently as December 1988, Senator GLENN said:

> I worked very closely with John when he was chairman of the Armed Services Committee. So I have no doubt that he would make a good Secretary of Defense. But you know, it is not up to me. It is up to George Bush.

Well, I will not go on and read all of these but there are statements from Senators BENTSEN, GORE, NUNN, EXON and others, praising John Tower—Senator BYRD praising him for his ability, his forthrightness, and his knowledge. To allow this to be a partisan, bitter struggle would be a travesty. However, it is not too late. It is Friday, and we are going to be gone for a couple of days. In that time I hope a few of my Democrat colleagues will rethink or finally announce that they intend to support John Tower.

It is unfortunate that the Nation suffers while we dally. The President's administration is being given a spike in its heart by partisanship here on the Senate floor. I do not think it is good for America. It is not good for the Senate. It is not good for the President. And in the long run, it is not good for the preservation of peace and freedom around the world.

It is a denial of opportunity to all. There is nothing beneficial about what has happened with respect to this debate, and the charges made here on the Senate floor. It is going to have a tremendous effect on the respect the American people have in Congress, and it is going to have the news media start talking about things that they have not up to now.

It is unbelievable to me that this could have happened. I would hope that some of my colleagues would help those of us who are for Senator Tower to bring this thing to a close.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho yields the floor.

Mr. WARNER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Mr. NUNN, and I are prepared to try to accommodate our colleagues today. I know on this side of the aisle there are a great many that are desirous of coming forth and stating their views on this important nomination. We thank our colleague from Idaho this morning.

Mr. President, I ask that when Senators come to the floor to speak today, Monday, whatever the duration of this debate may be, that they think in terms of fairness and fact. Let us judge John Tower in the same manner we daily judge ourselves. Many of us have had the opportunity to be trained in the law.

I would like to speak for just a few minutes about some guidelines that I found personally helpful as I worked my way through the information, allegations, fantasy, and fiction that have been heaped on the Senate here in the last 2 months.

Shortly, the chairman will be speaking this morning on the procedures that he and I followed in preparing the record for the committee, and then the work of the Armed Services Committee. I am confident that the responsibility that was placed on the Armed Services Committee up until Thursday night—I use that as the fork in the road respectfully—was done fairly, impartially and I think in accordance with the best standards and traditions of this institution. I shall have further remarks on that subject today. But at the moment, I would like to turn to some notes that I made during the night.

I sketched down the following: A basic rule of American fairness is we decide matters of importance on facts—not on rumor, not on innuendo. The FBI report which has been the subject of much discussion thus far and indeed I am certain will be the subject of a great deal of discussion today—let us make certain we understand that is not fact in and of itself. It is really in my judgment information. Much of it, if not the bulk of it, was drawn simply from interrogation of individuals by the agents. I am not here to disparage the agents. In my judgment, I think the FBI—well, time will tell, but I think they did their best. And they performed as they have done in the past and likely in the future. They simply went out and asked an individual "Do you know John Tower? Tell us what you believe in your judgment are those criteria by which he can serve in this office."

Then, there are a standard series of questions. But that is not subject to cross-examination. It is not necessarily corroborated or uncorroborated. It is simply gathered, written down and given in the formal report to the Senate. I classify it as information and not evidence.

While a confirmation process is not and should not be a judicial proceeding, certain rules of judicial process which are designed to learn the truth, I think, are worthy of observation and worthy of being followed. For example, generally hearsay evidence should be afforded very little weight in seeking the truth. Likewise, information provided by witnesses not subject to cross-examination should be taken again lightly unless there is no doubt about the individual's motives, powers of observation, and qualifications to provide the information in question.

If we are seeking the truth, we should follow that criteria. And, yesterday, we had splashed in the papers and then on the floor of the Senate sharply conflicting reputations about a witness and his credibility. Nevertheless, it seized the headlines, and we are still struggling to try to determine the truth of those allegations.

Third, information provided by one person which cannot be confirmed by others in a position to observe the same circumstances should be afforded again little weight in attempting to learn the truth. Fifth, information provided by those unwilling to even tell the FBI or allow the FBI to use their name should be very cautiously weighed if we are to learn the real facts especially when that information is not corroborated by others willing to attach their names. Last, we should regard nonspecific information as having little value if it cannot be tested for the truth.

In short, while this is not a judicial proceeding, we should not forget those rules which indeed have guided other tribunals, courts, and others, in the search for the truth.

We cannot let fiction, innuendo, and rumor determine the outcome of this nomination. Rather, I think great weight should be accorded, first, the judgment of the Commander in Chief of the Armed Forces of the United States, the President of the United States, who unequivocally and consistently has said that he knows John Tower and has full faith and confidence in his ability to discharge the office for which he has been nominated.

Second, the Members of the U.S. Senate who have served with John Tower during the course of his 24 years therein form a body of evidence and fact that, in my judgment, is uncontested.

Last, we have our own personal observations and knowledge, having worked with John these many, many years. We should apply that knowledge and a sense of fairness, as we look at the information that is in S-407, and as we strive to look for facts and truth, and judge John Tower as we judge ourselves.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield for a question?

Mr. WARNER. Yes, I yield.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, a fact occurs to me, and I spoke on the floor moments ago. The Senator from Virginia has been in the Senate longer than I have, as has the chairman of the committee. How is this debate going to go on without causing great acrimony on the Senate floor? Some of us would look at that report and see it as innuendos and falsehoods, or some would look at it and think there is some justification. This is a very clear-cut issue, and it is obviously getting closer and closer to a partisan free-for-all.

I made the observation to the Washington Post the other day that the problem with this is—and I do not like to see this; I do not like to see issues of national security and foreign policy become partisan in any fashion. Yet, that is what happened, and I still think there is time to avoid it, if we can get some change in this.

I was reminded of the recent television movie that came from the book "Lonesome Dove," I read the book, and the movie was very well done. At the end, Gus McCrae is carried back to the Rio Grande to be buried by his lifelong friend, Woodrow Caul, and it reminds me of what is happening here. It is as though our colleagues in the majority party seem to be under some kind of an illusion that they are going to be able to take Senator Tower down to the Rio Grande and bury him along the orchards of the Lonesome Dove and not have a whole bunch of Senators accompanying that burial scene.

What is the view of the Senator from Virginia, who has made a great effort to work with the chairman of the committee? I observed that in the 2 years I was there. Where does he think this debate will lead the Senate, if we cannot get three or four or five Senators to announce rather soon? The partisan free-for-all has not started yet is what I am saying. I say it will be starting next week.

Mr. WARNER. Let me say to my colleague that we are, indeed, I hope, searching for the truth. We are, indeed, debating in the allegedly greatest debating group on Earth. The important thing is that each and every Member of this body make his or her decision based on independent and objective judgment. We cannot let this debate become—and I hope it will never be so characterized—a power grab of the power of the President to make his selection, given to him by the people of this country and reposed in him in writing by the Constitution of the United States.

I say to the Senator that if we draw up on the ramparts, Republican squared off against Democrat, and engage in a civil war, then the truth will perish somewhere in between. I pray that that shall not happen.

Mr. NUNN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KOHL.). The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, yesterday, in my opening remarks on this nomination, I referred to four respected publications that cover the Defense Department very closely: the Army Times, Navy Times, Air Force Times, and Defense News, all of which have come out in their editorials in opposition to John Tower's nomination. Those editorials are a part of the RECORD at this point. My friend Ben Schemmer, editor of the Armed Forces Journal, pointed out to me yesterday afternoon, quite appropriately, that there is another respected publication that covers national security issues very closely—and very well, I might add—that has endorsed John Tower's nomination to be Secretary of Defense.

To make the record of the Senate's debate on this nomination as complete and balanced as possible, I ask unanimous consent that the Armed Forces Journal article in support of Senator Tower's nomination written by Ben Schemmer be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IS IT TOWER'S FORCE OF CHARACTER, NOT THE LACK OF IT, THAT WORRIES HIS DETRACTORS?

(By Benjamin F. Schemmer, Editor, Armed Forces Journal International)

While Mikhail Gorbachev's "peacekrieg" excites the west with promises of a moderate new defense policy, President George Bush's defense policy appears in limbo because his Secretary of Defense-designate still awaits muster by the U.S. Senate. Gorbachev makes headlines with a cascade of appealing new initiatives; John G. Tower makes news having his dignity shredded by a torrent of allegations that he lacks the moral fiber, impartiality, and managerial experience to defend America (and our allies) honestly and efficiently.

John Tower hasn't just been carefully "screened" for this appointment; he's been "sifted," as he noted wryly a few weeks ago. Tower is undergoing democracy's version of Chinese water torture, given the weeks of White House interrogatories, FBI background checks, and press scrutiny he underwent in November and December. Since Tower's nomination on December 16th, the Senate Armed Services Committee has been undertaking a microscopic postmortem of all those inquiries—a process that some now view as an autopsy rather than the independent check of fitness for office which the Senate is supposed to provide. But the process is taking so long and has been so punctuated with innuendo that some pundits have concluded that John Tower's crucible has become George Bush's albatross. But they haven't questioned the double standards behind some challenges to Tower's confirmation.

Some say Tower's effectiveness as Secretary of Defense will be diminished, at least initially, because of the prolonged public scrutiny he has undergone while waiting, first, to be nominated and, now, to be confirmed. Others suggest he will be crippled simply because so many questions have been raised about him, no matter they should prove unfounded.

Concerns like those have been voiced several times, for instance, by Representative Les Aspin, Chairman of the House Armed Services Committee. It's a curious argument—as if what might now disqualify Tower from serving as Secretary of Defense is that he's been more thoroughly vetted for the post than any of the 16 Defense Secretaries who, should he be confirmed, will have served before him. Following that logic, one might as well suggest that George Prescott Bush should have refused the oath of office on January 20th because he had to campaign so long to win a vote of confidence from the American people.

Late last week, just when it seemed the Senate Armed Services Committee had about concluded its commendably painstaking and unprecedented investigation of Tower's fitness for office, a vote on his confirmation was delayed because of a new allegation challenging Tower's personal conduct. To their credit—but Tower's pain (and the President's)—Senators Sam Nunn and John Warner, the Committee's Chairman and ranking minority member, immediately made public news of the charge and asked the White House to have the FBI investigate it. Atop that, late last week two defense tabloids (Defense News and Army Times, owned by the same publisher) issued press releases flaking editorials from this week's editions that headlined, "Tower Should Step Aside." That made the CBS, NBC, and ABC evening news on Friday, even though neither contained any new information or new allegations: their thrust was "it is [Tower's] job since 1986 as a defense consultant that is most troubling."

That was the ultimate redundancy in double standards: two tabloids which depend for most of their income on advertising from defense firms (as does the magazine which I edit) challenged Tower's impartiality, while touting their own editorial independence and reportorial integrity, even though their pages are filled with news reports about hardware programs their advertisers are managing.

While John Tower's mettle continues to be tested by an overload of stray voltage, it is to President Bush's credit that he continues quietly to forge the comprehensive reassessment of American defense policies and Pentagon priorities which John Tower has promised. Indeed, as the latest spate of allegations made America's front pages and TV tubes last weekend, Tower was at the White House late Saturday afternoon working on the revised defense budget which the President will present to Congress late this week. One doubts that President Bush would have had Tower working on that agenda were he concerned that John G. Tower might not survive the latest round of character assassinations.

I've known John Tower well over a decade, and I've traveled with him to Europe to forums noted especially for their collegial, informal, after-hour discussions with our NATO allies-environments uniquely conducive to honest exchanges of differing views, but also replete with temptations to let one's hair down too much or to overindulge in the European grape. Until January 20th, Tower was the chairman of our board of directors, and my publisher and I have had occasion to enjoy Tower's company over lunch, over cocktails, at receptions, and during dinner. I have never seen John Tower "womanize;" I have never seen him under the influence of alcohol; I have never seen him embarrass himself, his committee, or his country. Indeed, his personal conduct has been a model of probity. Professionally, he is a hard-nosed but caring boss, a manager who minces no words yet gets things done with diplomacy and dispatch. He has never intruded on our editorial work, whether on behalf of his defense contractor clients or any other cause.

Indeed, I suspect that it is his force of character, not his lack of it, that worries some people about Tower's appointment as Secretary of Defense. To the discomfort of many senior military leaders, for instance, Tower has said repeatedly he plans to take a hard look at Service "roles and missions," a Pentagon sacred cow that most of his predecessors went out of their way never to challenge. He's also made clear that he plans to focus on "people" as a way of coping with constrained defense budgets; that translates to a challenge of military "force structure," another issue most members of the Joint Chiefs of Staff would prefer to avoid.

There is an old military saying, "Hardship builds character." Could it be that Tower's crucible may turn out to be the best testimony yet to George Bush's judgment of personal integrity and professional competence?

OUR BOSS QUIT, NOW HE NEEDS YOUR HELP

He quit; he's left us. A hard-nosed but caring boss, he could get more done with fewer words than any man we've ever known. But the President gave him a better offer, heading a team that will end amateur night in the Pentagon. Former Senator John G. Tower resigned as Chairman of AFJI's Board of Directors effective January 20th, and as this issue went to press, he was midway through his Senate confirmation hearings to become America's 17th Secretary of Defense, the most thoroughly vetted one in America's history John Tower wasn't just carefully "screened" for this appointment; as he's put it, he was "sifted." It's been a little rough on Tower, but he's a tough guy; and the unprecedented scrutiny he's undergone will in the end, be good for America as well as our allies, imposing special confidence from the outset as Tower undertakes his heavy responsibilities in these uniquely challenging times.

We forego the usual temptation to give an incoming Secretary of Defense our advice, John Tower doesn't need it. What he needs now is your help—honest input from real professionals on the pitfalls and potential ahead.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, yesterday Senator COHEN criticized the absence of confrontation and cross-examination in the committee's inquiry into the facts of the Tower nomination. He also went on to draw a parallel to the Salem witch trials. We have heard a lot of people talk in that vein in the last 2 or 3 days.

Before I get into this subject, I would like to say that any time I am on a different side of an issue of major national security or foreign policy importance with Senator COHEN, I have second thoughts. I scratch my head and search my soul to see if I have made an error, because I think he is one of the most thoughtful, conscientious, articulate, and wise Members of the U.S. Senate. I have done that in this case.

I must say that his strong support of Senator Tower has given me more pause than any other single factor in this overall deliberation. It has made my decision tougher. So I have great respect for Senator COHEN. But there are a number of very significant differences between the committee's proceedings on the Tower nomination and the events in Salem, starting with the fact that the poor souls who were burned in Salem did not have the entire apparatus of the Federal Bureau of Investigation assigned to check out and, if indicated by the evidence, rebut the accusations; and, indeed, the FBI did rebut numerous allegations about this nominee and they did it very effectively on a number of specific occasions.

I think it is important for the public to understand that the FBI in this matter is not in the role of a prosecutor. They have not conducted an investigation for the purpose of seeking an indictment. They have not gone out and tried to find evidence against any individual. They have considered the White House—the President, and the Counsel for the President—to be their client from day one through the last report. That is the client that the FBI has looked to. I want to say, frankly, that in spite of frustrations many people have expressed about this matter, I believe that, under all the circumstances they were faced with, the FBI has done a commendable job in this background investigation.

Although I do not agree with Senator COHEN's conclusions, he did echo the deep concern that I expressed yesterday morning about the difficult problems we face in this confirmation process.

There are several important facts that I think should be added to his observations: First of all, the Bush transition team was deeply divided on the Tower nomination because of allegations of misconduct, a fact well reported in the media. There are people who are acting as if this whole thing started when the Senate Armed Services Committee started our hearings. That is not true. I will put in the RECORD during the debate a stack of news articles concerning allegations aired in the press before we ever had the first hearing.

The business about "womanizing" and "alcohol"—, all of those words being tossed around—and I have not used the word "womanizing" in my consideration of the nomination—did not start with the Armed Services Committee. Those words were well out in the news media before President Bush ever made his decision, and I think everybody ought to understand that.

I want to make another point: President Bush, himself, relied heavily on the FBI report to make his decision, to continue to stand by that decision, and to come out of the White House on numerous occasions to say that the FBI had gunned down this allegation and that allegation.

So the FBI report that has been so severely criticized here is the same report that President Bush relied on and it is the same type of FBI report that he relies on for all of his other decisions relating to nominations.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, will the chairman yield for a question on that?

Mr. NUNN. No. I want to finish my remarks. Then I will be glad to yield. I thank the Senator.

The FBI report was made available to every member of the committee. Not one member—not one member who voted on the Tower nomination for Senator Tower—said, "Let's not rely on this report. Let's get the witnesses up here and have a hearing."

There was never a motion made in committee in the whole time we met, executive or otherwise, to get witnesses in, never one. We did have a discussion. We discussed it on a couple of occasions.

Every member of our committee fully knew that there were serious, deeply held concerns by committee members, including the chairman, about matters that were raised in the FBI report. Yet not one member moved at any time to reopen the hearings or to call witnesses.

I offered Senator Tower the opportunity to have rebuttal witnesses. I made that offer to him personally after the open and executive session in which Mr. Weyrich and Mr. Jackson testified. I stated to him that I would be glad to have rebuttal witnesses in open session or executive session. He declined.

Yesterday, I mentioned the fact that the committee's proceedings had been delayed as a result of information developed in the Ill Wind investigation into Pentagon procurement practices. The White House—not the Armed Services Committee—was so concerned about the information developing in that investigation that they asked us to hold up our proceedings for 13 days. They asked us to hold up. Senator WARNER will verify that. We did that. We did that. We received the FBI report on that matter on February 20. That report did not answer all the questions. I had my counsel go through that report. It left me with a series of unanswered questions. Yet the committee relied on the FBI report and the assurances of the executive branch in that matter that there was no direct evidence implicating Senator Tower in any criminal activities as the basis for not conducting our own inquiry into that matter.

But if we had followed the procedure that some now suggest, and which they did not ask for during our deliberations, we would call witnesses to resolve the answers that were not given by the February 20 FBI report, we could have had a week of hearings on that matter alone. But we did not do that.

The President asked us to rely on the FBI report and the Justice Department's judgment as the basis for determining that no direct evidence of involvement by John Tower in the Ill Wind scandal has been developed. That is exactly what we did. We relied on that.

The February 27 FBI report contains another development—who knows whether it is significant—of a financial allegation which is under continuing investigation.

Again, the President asked us to rely on the FBI report and the Justice Department on this matter. Senator WARNER and I pledged to do so. Should we have rejected that and insisted on having full-blown proceedings before our committee with confrontation and examination, I would say that would take another 2 weeks and if we did it, and it could spill over into some pending investigations, which I think would be entirely improper.

I think the President has made a reasonable request and I think we should rely on the Justice Department's good judgment on that matter.

A major issue which required detailed investigation by the FBI and extensive review by the committee staff involved allegations of Senator Tower's behavior with Eastern bloc women in Geneva. That is another area in which we relied primarily on the submissions of the executive branch.

As is well known, I repeatedly noted to the news media on at least three occasions, and maybe four or five, that they should be very cautious about the rumors floating around this town on the subject of Eastern bloc women. And yet, as detailed in our report, our attempts to obtain information from the executive branch, to "gun down" these allegations—using the term the President used—were repeatedly frustrated by the failure of the executive branch to provide the documents we requested.

Every time I as chairman assured the members of our committee—and in some cases the news media when they were asking questions in this overall area about Geneva allegations—every time I assured them that there was nothing to these allegations, lo and behold, another Government document would show up, usually in the news media, or in Congressman DINGELL's committee, containing allegations of misconduct.

If members of our committee wanted a trial, we could have had one on Geneva—not only on the alleged misconduct in Geneva, but also on the withholding of documents and destruction of a document by one agency.

It does not take a very skeptical person to ask about the confidence we should have in the executive branch when every document adverse to the nominee was omitted from the Geneva files provided to us by the administration.

Now I believe these were innocent omissions and I still believe that today. I allege nothing. I believe it was innocent destruction of a document, and I do not think there was anything material in that document. But to determine whether the documents were innocently or deliberately withheld, we could have had one big trial on those issues.

There are many questions that could be asked about the credibility of those materials. Yet, in the end, we relied on their documents. We relied on the FBI report, and we determined that the allegations of improper relations with foreign nationals was unfounded.

I have said that over and over and over and over again. We found nothing on that. We found nothing on the subject of Geneva and John Tower and Eastern bloc women.

I do not recall any members saying we should not rely on the FBI report to resolve these matters. I do not recall anyone making a motion for a trial-type hearing on Geneva matters.

There was also a serious allegation that Senator Tower lobbied on behalf of LTV's interest in the C-FIN Program prior to his registration under the Lobbying Act. The allegation also extended to his activities on behalf of British Aerospace, which also had an interest in the C-FIN Program. The nominee compounded the difficulty in this area in dealing with this matter by his own uncertainty as to the defense-related activities of British Aerospace.

We could have called witnesses from LTV, British Aerospace, our staff, former staffers, Senators, and Pentagon officials. It might have taken several weeks to sort out this matter alone. We could have had ample opportunity for confrontation and cross-examination. We did not do that. Instead, we relied on the FBI report, executive branch materials, and Senator Tower's submissions for our conclusion that his activities did not constitute a violation of the Lobbying Act. No one who now supports John Tower asked us to take a different approach in this matter.

Significant questions were raised about the manner in which Senator Tower disposed of the nearly half-million dollars that he raised for his 1984 campaign before he decided not to run for reelection. Our own Senate rules, Senate rule 38 precludes use of such left-over funds for personal use.

There were a variety of expenditures which raised questions. We directed those questions to Senator Tower and relied on the FBI report and a documentary review by staff. We could have called a large number of witnesses to make our own record, with full examination or cross-examination. We did not do that. We relied on the FBI report for our determination that Senator Tower was not in violation of the Senate rules. That is what they found and I agree with them.

The conduct of the nomination proceedings of Melvyn Paisley to be Assistant Secretary of the Navy in 1981, when Senator Tower was chairman of the committee, also was a matter of serious concern to several members of our committee, and everybody knows that.

As a result of a review conducted by Senator WARNER and myself, we concluded that the FBI report on Melvyn Paisley contained "serious allegations" of misconduct. That was the FBI report that apparently was never looked at by our committee back in 1981. We have attempted to determine whether this information was made available to the committee in 1981 when Senator Tower was chairman. To date, we have received very little useful information from either the Reagan administration or Bush administration. Senator Tower denied on the record that he was made aware of the adverse information involving Mr. Paisley. We did not attempt to obtain any corroboration on the record for Senator Tower's statement. We did not call witnesses. Instead, we relied on the FBI report—and we did so even though the executive branch has been uncooperative to date—or at least unsuccessful to date—the efforts undertaken in response to Senator WARNER and myself as to our questions to determine what went wrong in the handling of the Paisley nomination. Something went wrong either in the White House or in our committee or in both.

We could have had a trial on that, quite a hearing.

We did not do so. We did not find any misconduct in this matter by Senator Tower. Nobody who supported Senator Tower through our proceedings objected when we relied on the FBI report.

There were other allegations raising serious issues about Senator Tower's fitness: whether he was involved in a last-minute, unexplained insertion of a provision of the fiscal year 1985 authorization bill that had the effect of directing a sole-source procurement of a new 120-millimeter mortar for the Army from a foreign source.

We found, relying primarily on the FBI report, that he had no involvement in that matter.

Whether Senator Tower was aware of an approach to the 1980 Reagan-Bush campaign, through his staff, by an alleged emissary from Iran, who sought to make a deal with that campaign for release of the hostages after the election.

We found no improper actions by Senator Tower, and we relied primarily on the FBI report.

We could have called witnesses on these matters. There would have been days, if not weeks or examination, cross-examination, and rebuttal. We did not do that. We relied instead on the FBI report and our own formal inquiries for our determination that Senator Tower was not involved in these matters.

I would like to reiterate that I share the concerns raised so eloquently by Senator COHEN about the difficulties of relying on an FBI report to determine the fitness of a nominee. I am a lawyer by training. I revere the Bill of Rights and the basic guarantees of due process. But the Bush administration presented us with this nomination knowing full well that we would be faced with an FBI report filled with specific, direct allegations of misconduct, as well as hearsay, as well as contradictions, as well as rebuttals, as well as favorable comments in considerable detail.

It was a record, as Senator WARNER has stated, upon which reasonable persons could draw different conclusions. Yet it is the record upon which the Bush administration has asked us to rely. And, as I mentioned yesterday, there are many, many people who are turned down for considerations for Federal offices as a result of FBI reports before there is a formal nomination from the White House. Time after time after time, something will pop up in an FBI report and that individual is scratched from the list of consideration in terms of an appointment.

So I think those who are asking the question whether the Senate should rely on the FBI report should also ask the question: Should the President rely on the FBI reports? When we are asked whether we should even take into consideration people who do not give their name, confidential sources, the same question ought to be asked of the White House: Should the White House consider confidential sources when the President decides to turn someone down? It is the same principle, as far as I am concerned.

Perhaps we ought to review the whole procedure here. But when people start looking for an alternative, they are going to find that alternatives are not easy to prescribe.

I have heard over the last few days a number of interesting suggestions about how one might conduct a confirmation proceeding. But if anyone had wanted to use the FBI report on John Tower merely as a starting point for trial-type hearings, these hearings would have lasted longer, they would have been lengthier, they would have been more complex than any hearings held by the U.S. Senate in my memory, and that includes long before I got here.

I think the time and place to ask for witnesses and different procedures really is in committee. We could have considered it there. We could have made a deliberate decision. But, I repeat, not one time, not one time during the entire deliberations of our committee was there ever a motion made by any member, Republican or Democrat, to change the procedure to do things differently.

Have we run a perfect set of nomination hearings? No. But I will defy any committee of this Senate to take the number of allegations we received and handle them with any more dispatch and with any more thoroughness.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. NUNN. I will be glad to yield in about 20 seconds.

I guess I would summarize, Mr. President, by saying that the frustration does not appear to be with the FBI report that clarifies and rebuts allegations against Senator Tower and, in many cases, rebuts them completely. The frustration seems to be with the FBI report's allegations that are not rebutted. I think that if you are going to complain about those, then you also have to complain about the others. I think that is only fair.

Mr. President, I am happy to yield for a question.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator. I will seek the floor in my own right here in a second, after the Senator is finished.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, in fairness, the Senator might want to respond.

Mr. President, I will seek recognition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Before I make my statement that I intended to make, I would like to ask my friend a question. Before I ask that question, I will make a statement of my own.

I was interviewed by the FBI at length, two members of the FBI. I fully expected the President of the United States to be informed of what I had told the FBI.

I would ask my friend whether he was interviewed by the FBI and, if he was, whether he does not agreed with me that the President of the United States has a right to give a different weight to those people who have served with a Senator for years, those who have traveled with him, have lived with him, have spent night after night with him, than he does informants that are undisclosed on the FBI report? Was the Senator interviewed by the FBI? What did he tell them?

Mr. NUNN. The answer to that question is yes, I was, and I gave a favorable recommendation. I told them very clearly that I had no knowledge of any reason that Senator Tower could not serve effectively as Secretary of Defense. And I also said that in a statement when he was nominated. I also felt that way until about half way through these hearings.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I have traveled with the Senator from Georgia and I have great, fond affection for the Senator from Georgia and his lovely lady. As a matter of fact, we intended to spend time together, I hope, soon.

My basic problem with this issue is I have trouble with the Senate—and I am an ex officio member of the Senator's committee. I was there. I did not make a motion pertaining to Mr. Weyrich, for instance. I made a suggestion he should be sworn. I wish he had been sworn, but I did not make a motion concerning the hearing.

I was really not worried about the hearing because I had been informed that there had been a series of Senators interviewed, people that had known John Tower for years, as I have, who were character witnesses.

I want to state to the Senate that I was U.S. attorney, as I have said before on the floor, for many years, many in my life at that time anyway, not as long as I have been a Senator. But I was U.S. attorney in Alaska and I have used FBI reports there. I have used FBI reports here on many occasions. I believe that in their background investigations, in terms of this type of procedure, as the Senator from Georgia has said, they are capable people who do their utmost to present both sides of any issue. I think the Senator from Georgia would agree with that.

I have a memory of the reports that I saw on a gentleman from Georgia. I am one of the Republicans who supported that gentleman all the way through his trouble because I read the FBI reports and I paid particular attention to the people who had known Bert Lance. And I have since learned to know him and to like him myself and I supported him then under attacks that came which were not too dissimilar from some of those that are coming now.

There were many on our side who said, "This is a chance to really be partisan." But many of us said, "No, no, this is the President's choice and the President is the one that made the decision."

This FBI report was basically for the President to make up his mind in the first instance. And as he got rumors, he asked us to hold up and give him a chance to review additional reports to see whether he would change his mind. But we really are not judging John Tower in terms of this FBI report, we are judging George Bush. The President has made the determination on the basis of the advice that comes to him in these FBI reports that he supports John Tower. One of those statements was made by me.

I want to review that statement that I made and what I remember at the time. But, first, let me just suggest to the Senator from Georgia and others here on the floor who oppose my good friend John Tower that maybe we ought to think a little bit about what we are doing.

Suppose, for instance, that a witness had come in and said this:

> Remaining within reach are the jam and a weak (three-ounce) scotch and soda—always Johnny Walker Red—which the prostrate . . . will sip occasionally over the next four hours in the tradition of Palmerston, Pitt, and Baldwin. However, the legend that he is a heavy drinker is quite untrue. . . . is a sensible, if unorthodox, drinker. There is always some alcohol in his bloodstream, and it reaches its peak late in the evening after he has had two or three scotches, several glasses of champagne, at least two brandies, and a highball, but his family never sees him the worse for drink. He remarks: "We all despise a man who gets drunk." And, after an exchange of views on drinking: "All I can say is that I have taken more out of alcohol than alcohol has taken out of me."

That is from William Manchester's book, "The Last Lion."

You know who it is: Winston Churchill.

What standards do we have now as a nation that those of us in the Senate can allow people to come in as undisclosed, unidentified informants in an FBI process and say to us: We cannot confirm this man to be a Secretary of Defense because he has a reputation of drinking.

I traveled with John Tower. I lived with him in Geneva on four different occasions, three times with my assistants; one time with my wife, my assistants and my daughter. I went to Geneva at least 14 times during the process of our oversight of the arms control agreements. My distinguished friend, the Senator from Georgia, the chairman of this committee, was there on many of those times.

Who knows John Tower best? Someone whose office was around the corner from his in the Capitol for 8 years when I was whip and he had his Capitol office just down the hall? Someone who walked back and forth with him at night, all night long on several occasions—on many occasions, not just several occasions.

Who knows him best? Someone who has traveled from base to base to base with him? Or someone who reports—and we have now just debunked that report—but he was seen touching a young woman? I wonder what we would do if he had touched a young man?

The standards before the Senate are on trial. I want to say that my friend from Idaho is right. The ramifications of this are going to be immense.

I want the Senate to know I have lived with John Tower. I argued with him more, perhaps, than did the Senator from Georgia. I lost battles with him on this floor as I sought to change defense policy through the appropriations process. Everybody knows that.

As a matter of fact, my friend from Arizona, who is not here, writes about this in his book. You ought to read what he says about me in that book. He disagreed with me, too. In my judgment, history will prove me right and them wrong. That is the essence of this society of ours. We are entitled to our opinions, and we present them as forcefully as we can and we fight here for those positions. Some people lose and other people win, and then sometimes the tables turn.

But there is one thing about John Tower. He never took an argument off this floor. We would argue and walk down that hall and go to our respective offices to make calls, or we would argue and we would leave here and go take a trip to a defense base or, on many occasions, after he left here and he was in Geneva, I would talk to him at length about what was going on here. We would sit around and we would have a glass of wine in our hands. But I never in my life, as I told the FBI, have seen John Tower inebriated. I never have seen him when he wasn't in control of his faculties. I have never seen him be less than an absolute Southern gentleman to women.

Who is entitled to greater weight on the floor of the Senate, those people in the FBI report or me? That is the problem for the Democrats in this body. I say that advisedly to my friends.

He is my friend. I thought he was your friend. And I want some justice for my friend. Somehow or other, the history of his life with us has to be reflected in this procedure.

I spent yesterday traveling up to New Hampshire, Mr. President. It was an affair of the heart because, as a young lad, I sat up there in the gallery and watched Norris Cotton assist my State become a State. I remember those days. When he passed away, I went up there and attended the funeral.

I take those days in this body with a deep feeling and I know John Tower did, too. What happens to those days in this process? Swept aside; swept aside by a process of relying upon FBI reports that, as a U.S. attorney, I would look at and I would say: That is great, but those are not creditable witnesses. Those are not people that a jury would rely on. I will not bring that case.

The number of times I did that can be checked with the FBI. It was not often, but I did it. And every U.S. attorney has done it.

As I said, I exercised my rights as an ex officio member of the Armed Services Committee several times to attend the meetings of the Armed Services Committee. I never have had an inkling of a doubt that the members of that committee had the same experience with John Tower here in the Senate as I did. He was an irascible debator who could really get in and be personal and dig at someone so one would wonder, really, sometimes, how he could be as tough in terms of things he would do to try and get other people to change their minds on a position that they had taken.

This is a man who feels strongly about this country. I say to you in all good humor, with every good intention, there is more involved here than just John Tower.

Next week, when I speak at length on this subject, I intend to raise some of the issues that the Senator from Georgia has raised concerning the question of what are the rights of a nominee. This is not just an ordinary nomination that is coming up. As the Senator from Georgia says, those are knocked aside.

I was a Presidential appointee in the administration at one time, the Eisenhower administration, and I did not hire people sometimes based on FBI reports. I admit that. I think it is a process that may be unfair but those candidates are not subject to confirmation. They are not subject to this procedure. The Constitution gives them rights but we have to have some way to judge people we do not know so we rely on these background statements.

I agree. I think in some instances they probably are unfair. This, however, is a constitutional process. This is an officer of the Federal Government who is required to be brought to this body for our advice and consent and we need to examine further into that. We need to examine the total history of that as to what is our role and, if it is to change with John Tower, by the good Lord as long as I stay here—and I think that will be a long time, Mr. President—it will be the same for every other Cabinet nominee that comes before this body.

I tell the Senate I know John Tower. You know John Tower. It is time for us to come up here on the basis of our own knowledge.

I challenge any Member of the Senate to come in and tell me that he has seen John Tower inebriated. I challenge any Member of the Senate to come here and tell us that he knew that John Tower had problems like this but did not come forward. I would like to know who are the six Members of the other side who advised the President of the United States that this was a good selection, through the FBI investigations? Who are they? Why should we misjudge George Bush on the basis of the reliance he has placed on us as witnesses interviewed by the FBI? Now we give greater reliance to these people who come before us who might as well be coming in with sacks over their heads?

I read that FBI report: Confidential informant with a name blanked out, with a number or a letter. It is not the same.

The Senator from Georgia is right. This is not a criminal case. Those would not even be in there in a criminal case because any U.S. attorney knows he has to call witnesses.

Maybe we should reconsider our process. I will give the Senate a chance to do that next week because this is a case where the world is looking at us. We have been told for years there is something called senatorial courtesy. Somehow or another, some people thought we had brushed things under the table that we knew. The implication is we would know something about somebody and not bring it up because of senatorial courtesy. Here is a situation where those of us who know him are being brushed under the table, and we are listening to undisclosed informants in an FBI process destroy the character of a man who we served with.

I met John Tower in 1961. I have known him as a friend since that time, and if he were here he would be chuckling. He would be a little bit amused that I am the one to defend John Tower. Again, I say I do not think any of you argued with him and fought with him, the way I have. I want the Senate to look at this on the basis of what we know about John Tower, and if anyone wants to debate me about John Tower and what I have said about what I know about John Tower, this is the place to do it, in front of God and everybody.

I find it very difficult to believe that in the years that I served under Democratic Presidents, I was willing to look at issues on the basis of the prerogative of the President and that today I do not know of one Member on the other side of the aisle who is looking at it the way I did.

Mr. President, maybe I was wrong.

Mr. GRAMM. Will the distinguished Senator yield for one question?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes.

Mr. GRAMM. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for yielding. I would like to ask him something here that bothers me, I guess, now more than anything else, and that is there is nothing like a parallel with how the system of justice works in this country and what is happening here. Let me give you the example and then pose the question.

When I went up to room S-407 to read first the committee statement and then the FBI report, the first thing that I confronted was a story, which we all know from the Washington Post yesterday, about an Army sergeant who tells this tale about Senator Tower's behavior. My first reaction in reading the statement was it made my stomach hurt.

I had an advantage over everybody else since I visited the military base, I had known Senator Tower, but there it was, the allegation prominently displayed the first thing you look at. Members went up there and read that book, made a decision and came down to the third floor and walked into the press room and announced, "I am going to vote against John Tower."

Yesterday it comes out that six people were eyewitnesses to Senator Tower's visit to the base from generals to sergeants. The sergeant who made the accusation, it turns out, was not even at the base when Senator Tower visited, and he was subsequently treated for mental illness and released.

What bothers me, and I pose my question, does it bother you that people have made a judgment on an accusation, have taken a public position and now that the allegation has been totally and utterly destroyed, they are in the difficult position of coming back or having to consider coming back and saying, "I was affected by that allegation. It was a factor in my decision and now it is destroyed having to make a public change in position."

This is so much different from the legal system where the jury hears everybody present their case and nobody says anything until the end. Here people have taken public positions based on assertions that were the lead item in the indictment books, so to speak, that have now been utterly and totally destroyed.

Does that bother you that this process has been followed, and do you see that as a factor that can in any way be overcome by the debate?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, it bothers me considerably, the process that this Senator has mentioned. It bothers me because, in the first instance, FBI reports are for background information and they ought to be given a relative weight, as far as events and individual people are concerned. I do not think that original allegation should have been put out in the public press until it had been checked.

It reminds me of the other one I heard about the person from Arizona who had no ax to grind, I was told, came in and gave an affidavit concerning activities—or gave a statement, I do not know if it is an affidavit—activities of my good friend John Tower. After it was laboriously checked, it was found to be totally wrong. I do not know. You have to ask our friends on the other side of the aisle if they relied on them.

I did not need an FBI report to review John Tower. That is what I want to tell the Senate, and I do not know why anyone here who served with him did.

There are some Members of this body, I would hasten to say, if I was asked by the FBI, I would not recommend them for service in a Cabinet position, and there are probably others who would say the same thing about me because of my alleged temper, Mr. President. Or maybe other things, for all I know.

All I can tell you is, as far as I am concerned, the process is incomplete unless we become witnesses ourselves. Many of us here have a religious bent—I was interested yesterday to hear Norris Cotton had intended to go to the ministry in the first instance. It was a beautiful service, and it is too bad others did not have the time to attend.

Many of us here have deep, deep religious convictions, and we believe that we ought to try to witness those convictions. We do not publish it, but we go to our prayer breakfast and we go to the annual President's prayer breakfast. We try to encourage people to be involved. The whole concept of that is witnessing for a belief. I am here today because I want to be a witness for John Tower, and I want to be heard. I want my friends across the aisle to know if you cannot listen to me on this issue, then I believe it is going to be hard for me to address you on any issue. That is the problem for the future.

Maybe you did not know him the way I did. Maybe you did not travel with him the way I did. Maybe you did not stay in his home in Geneva the way I did. I even remember driving John Tower home on several occasions when we were in late at night in the early years when we served here together.

I have been his friend through two divorce proceedings. I have never had a divorce myself. I had one unfortunate loss, but I have not had a divorce myself. That would be a problem, I think, for any man. Through those periods, I never knew John Tower to lose control, not only through just the use of any kind of alcohol, but just lose control, period.

John Tower is a man, as we all know, in control of what he does. I think he would be tremendously in control of the Department of Defense. I spend as much time on defense as any man in the Senate. I think I know the Defense Department fairly well, but not as well as John Tower does. I think he is qualified to be a Secretary of Defense. I think in a period of a downward trend line in defense budgets, we need somebody who knows that Department, knows the relative value of systems, knows the relative value of different agencies, entities, within command of the Department of Defense, knows what costs money in the future if you do it now, knows how you can save money in the future if you do it differently, even if it might be a little more expensive now, somebody with brains, dedication, and commitment to his country. You think of that, Mr. President, and think of a Senator of the United States who is no longer serving in the body and who would you name? Again, I say to my friends on the other side of the aisle, who would you name who has that background and that capability other than John Tower?

If I were President of the United States and the Senate turned down John Tower, I would send his name back up again.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. WIRTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. WIRTH. I thank the Chair very much.

Mr. President, I would like to outline my own views and comment a little more informally on where I think we are and how I have arrived at my decision.

I had never met John Tower before he came into my office in January. Senator Tower visited me, as he did all the members of the Armed Services Committee, late one afternoon. We spent somewhere between a half an hour and an hour getting to know each other and discussing a variety of issues that were of concern to me. This was a courtesy visit by Senator Tower and very much in line with what one would expect of a nominee. We talked about conventional arms control, on area of particular concern to me. We also talked about the severe budget problems that the Defense Department faces, about how those problems fit into our overall budget package, and how we are going to go about sorting through the very tough decisions that are going to have to be made in the defense area.

I assumed after that relatively brief interview that I was going to vote for Senator Tower and from there went on to the hearings. I sat through most of those hearings, heard Senator Tower's testimony, heard the opening statements from all of my colleagues, and listened to the evidence as it was presented by witnesses coming before the committee.

Clearly, Senator Tower does know the Pentagon. He knows the programs. He knows the weapons systems, and nobody has questioned that. I did not agree with much of what he said about overall defense policy. Some of it I agreed with, some of it I did not. I did not come away from the hearing convinced that Senator Tower understood how rapidly this world is changing. The Soviet Union is a country that is changing before our eyes. The Soviet empire is collapsing. The Soviets have enormous economic problems which threaten to make them a second rate, or even a third rate, world economic power. The Soviet ideology is not being followed or being taken seriously by anybody in the world. The Soviet Union is changing, and with that the Soviet threat is changing.

I am not sure we would agree on a lot of U.S. economic positions around the world and how much should we be committing to defense at a time when some would suggest we are enormously overextended. All one has to do is look at our current budget to understand that. I am not sure he and I would agree on the role that Europe and Japan ought to be playing in their own defense. Nor am I sure that Senator Tower understands a lot of the new global realities, particularly new environmental realities such as the fact that we are now seeing our global environment stretched to the breaking point and that perhaps our most important alliance, our alliance with the environment, is severely threatened.

But agreements on that kind of substance are not the grounds upon which one makes a decision on a Cabinet appointee. As has been said over and over again, this is President Bush's choice. It is his constitutional responsibility, as has been suggested over again, to go through the evidence and nominate the person he feels most appropriate. It is our responsibility to look at that evidence, and if something unusual comes up, step in. If nothing comes up we do as we have in so many other sessions, let the appointment go through.

I found myself defending Senator Tower early on in these hearings. I defended him in the committee against the allegations made by one of the witnesses, a Mr. Paul Weyrich, whom I had met on one occasion before he came in. But we all know who Paul Weyrich is. He came in and in public session made a whole string of allegations, cited a whole string of what he said were facts about Senator Tower's behavior. Rapidly the committee moved to executive session and intensely questioned Mr. Weyrich about his allegations. This is a man who is no knee jerk liberal, no leftwing partisan, no liberal partisan. I think Paul Weyrich is a hero of the right. He came in and said to us that he knew that there was [a black box] in the White House filled with letters. Mr. Weyrich said that those letters were from Members of the Senate and others relating to the administration incident after incident about John Tower's behavior. Mr. Weyrich said that on the basis of what was in that black box we should not confirm John Tower as Secretary of Defense. I asked Mr. Weyrich—and other members of the committee did as well, "Have you seen the black box? He said no, he had not seen the black box. I asked him how did he know that there was such a black box? And he said that he had been told by a White House staff person, who had been a good source prior to that, that the black box existed.

I said, "Well, if you have not seen the black box, who was the person who told you about the black box?" At this point he said, "I can't tell you who that person is."

We have right there, it seems to me, a very good example of something resembling tail gunner Joe McCarthy saying, "and I have here a list." There was no evidence of that, and I think all of us jumped right on Mr. Weyrich and tried to push aside all of those allegations as absolutely absurd. All of this discussion occurred in open session.

Following this, I thought—as many in the committee did—that I would probably support him. Not with the great enthusiasm that I support Mr. Reilly at the EPA or Watkins at the Department of Energy, but I felt he was the President's choice.

But very soon after that the erosion began; the erosion that is being debated on the floor and the erosion which all of us have to judge. The FBI reports started to arrive, one and then another, and it was our responsibility as members of the committee—some may not want us to carry out that responsibility, but we have that responsibility—to review those reports and to sort through the information and to make a judgment. This is what we are asked to do in the process of advise and consent required by the Constitution.

Unhappily, this is a little bit like taking off the layers of onion; the more of them you take off, the more you want to cry. Thus, I became more troubled as more information came in. There was some misunderstandings, I believe, between the chairman and the White House, and it is unfortunate that they occurred. This was not the best run process from the point of view of the White House but in any case we are all big people. We understand that mistakes are made.

Leaving that aside, I think we have to look carefully at the substance of these allegations. The information from the FBI, in my opinion, fell into three groups—conflict of interest, behavior with women, and alcohol.

Let me briefly take those one at a time if I might, Mr. President.

On the conflict of interest issues, I think perhaps there are some very real problems and each Member of this body is going to have to make his or her own decision about this. What was his relationship with various contractors? What did he do for the very significant fees he received? What happened after he was in Geneva? How rapidly was the door revolving? Can he do the job as the Secretary? Is he compromised by his close relationship with a variety of contractors? Or, if he was confirmed, what would he be left able to do at a time when we have some very, very significant procurement problems in the Pentagon. We have to weigh that and that is a judgment that each individual is going to have to come to.

The second issue, one which I find very troubling, is the issue of Senator Tower's personal behavior and the example and precedent that he sets relating to women.

In the 2-plus years that I have been on the Armed Services Committee, I have visited a lot of military bases, been out on ships, and talked to a lot of commanding officers in the military. One cannot help but be struck by the fact that every time you have a discussion with a commanding or executive officer, that individual inevitably brings up with a manner of significant pride the fact that women are being integrated, completely into the military. Except for combat assignments, women are asked to do everything that everybody else does. Women are to be treated absolutely as equals and not as objects.

This policy has been reiterated over and over again, and only last year a senior commander was piped out of the Navy for behavior that did not meet this code of conduct.

I have to ask myself, after all that I have seen in the report, if the Secretary of Defense can set an example for the Pentagon. If we are asking everybody in our armed services to behave in a certain way, we cannot have a different standard for the person at the top of the Department.

Everybody has a right to behave the way that they want in their own private lives. There is no question about that. But there are also times when what you do as an individual sets an example. We all have that responsibility here as Members of this body. If you are the head of a large organization, you have very specific responsibilities and I do not think that Senator Tower meets that test. This is the second issue that I find very troubling.

The third issue relates to alcohol. I think a review of his record suggests that this man had some very significant drinking problems in the 1970's. The question of real concern to us is how long have those problems continued? Does he continue to have that kind of problem? It is our business to think through the obligations that this man would carry, that the Secretary of Defense carries. A Secretary of Defense has the awesome responsibility of being second in the military chain of command.

Finally, what kind of an example does the nominee's actions set for the rest of the military when the military has very, very clear policies against alcoholism, and alcohol abuse? What kind of behavior should we expect from a Secretary, if we have requirements for people who are in sensitive command positions in the military? Are we going to have one standard for everybody in the military and another for the Secretary of Defense? I think not.

Each of these three areas has been discussed and is a matter for each of us, as individuals, to sort through. There is evidence on one side and evidence on another. There is, as I have said before, in this, no smoking pistol. I have come to the conclusion, however, that the ground is littered with empty cartridges. It is our job to sort through these cartridges. What do these cartridges mean? It is a difficult decision for each of us to make but we have that obligation, and we have to pursue it.

A couple of other comments, on the nomination process. What of the FBI report? There have been a lot of statements made here on the floor, and at the White House, and by the supporters of Senator Tower, calling for the release of the FBI report. If you are all concerned about what specific information is in that FBI report, then release it. The White House, however, is also saying that this is our report. It is a secret document. I believe, it is a White House report. The FBI works for the White House, so it is a White House report. You cannot have it both ways. You cannot on the one hand say we are not going to release the report because this is the President's document, but on the other hand turn around and say release this so all of these specific allegations come out and can be addressed publicly.

The FBI report is the President's report and I would urge those who are calling for its release to talk to the President about it. I happen to think that it would be very bad to release the report. I think that sets a very bad precedent. But if this is such an important matter, why do not our colleagues who are concerned about getting this report released talk to the President, and say to him, "Mr. President, release the report."

Now about the issue of partisanship. There have been suggestions made that this nomination has become a wild partisan binge. I have difficulty believing that. Rhetoric and hyperbole go a bit far when one considers who the chairman of the committee is. Certainly I would never suggest and I do not think very many people in this body would suggest that SAM NUNN is a rabidly partisan individual. SAM NUNN is a good Democrat, but first and foremost he is somebody that I think everybody in this body respects enormously. And to suggest that SAM NUNN is leading a vast partisan witch hunt I think is ludicrous.

For those who suggest that all the Democrats are voting one way and all the Republicans are voting another are wrong, I think we ought to turn that around and say to the people who are on the other side of the issue, "Why did you all vote together on the other side? You read the same evidence we did. Why are you acting in such a partisan fashion?"

Finally, on the partisan issue, I would again remind my colleagues of the record of confirmation of every other one of the President's nominees.

Let me make a comment if I might on the subject of appearance. There have been those who have said this is not important. Of course, we should be thinking about appearance. Appearance is important and rapidly becoming very negative. For example, the Air Force Times, February 20, stated that "John G. Tower is the wrong man for the job. Tower's nomination shows poor judgment by President Bush. It should be withdrawn. Failing that, it should be rejected."

The March 6, Navy Times stated that:

> The Defense Secretary should be known to be a man of upstanding character. President Bush should nominate another to lead the Defense Department. But if he does not, the full Senate should reject the nomination.

The Defense News, Monday, February 6 stated that:

> Mr. John Tower should withdraw his name from consideration to be Defense Secretary of the United States. It would be a service to the country and to the President.

Army Times, February 13, 1989 stated that:

> Tower should go. John Tower should withdraw his nomination to be the next Secretary of Defense.

Those perceptions are now prevelant and they are important. Even the President himself has said that they are important. President Bush in one of his first speeches after the inauguration said:

> The guiding principle will be simply to know right from wrong, to act in accordance with what is right, and to avoid even the appearance of what is wrong.

In a news conference shortly thereafter the President noted:

> We are in a different time now. What might be legal and might be perfectly sound ethically might have to be altered because of perception.

Perception and appearance are important and Mr. President the perception and the appearance are lousy.

One final note. I have been struck by the fact that this is not just an inside the beltway discussion. People all around the country are talking about it and asking about it; More and more individuals are concerned.

I come from a State that is half Republican and half Democrat. It is probably more conservative than liberal. It is certainly more Republican than Democrat, when you add in how the independent voters generally vote in the State of Colorado. Despite this, my mail and telephone calls have been running consistently at about 7 to 1 against Senator Tower. That struck me. I am also struck by the anecdotal information that each of us receives.

Policemen come up on the street and say, "You should not vote for this man." A group of students in this area were asking what is going on, and are overwhelmingly against Senator Tower. A gas station attendant filling up your car comes around and says, "I hope you are not going to vote for Senator Tower."

Mr. President, this is not a decision that any of us should take lightly. It is a decision which is of a precedent-setting nature, and it is one in which the reputation of a former colleague of many people is out in front of the public, being aired, and being discussed.

This is not an easy issue at all. It is my best judgment that we should not vote for the Tower nomination. It would be my recommendation to the President, or recommendation to John Tower, that the easiest thing to do is to withdraw his nomination, so that we can get on with the very important business of finding one of any number of very well-qualified individuals who can do this job. I can think of a list of 5, 6, 10 individuals, whose names could be sent up, and who could go flying through here. We must get on with the business of reviewing foreign and defense policy and have this administation get on with the business of not only leading the Western alliance but also fulfilling its responsibilities around the world.

Mr. President, the Senate has a constitutional obligation to review Presidential nominations for high office and to provide the body's "advise and consent" regarding those nominations. Reflecting a longstanding tradition of presumption in favor of the President's choice for Cabinet level appointees, the Senate has seldom rejected a President's nominee; only eight times in the history of the Republic has this occurred.

When on January 20, President Bush forwarded to the Senate the nomination of John G. Tower to be Secretary of Defense, there were few, if any, in this body predisposed to oppose the President's choice. John Tower is a man of considerable experience and significant knowledge in defense matters. When Senator Tower visited with me in my office on January 23, we discussed conventional arms control and budget issues facing the Department of Defense. I was inclined to support his nomination, as were many of my colleagues on the Armed Services Committee.

Over the next month, the committee conducted an exhaustive review of Senator Tower's qualifications to serve as Secretary of Defense. In the course of the committee's work, continuing allegations arose which required additional investigation by the FBI. Between January 7 and February 20, a total of seven FBI reports were forwarded to the committee concerning Senator Tower. The committee staff also reviewed independently more than 100 allegations of misconduct on the part of Senator Tower, most of which were determined to be baseless. And most of the allegations raised in the FBI reports were also proven to be baseless or contradicted by other accounts. But of the remaining allegations, there were sufficiently serious concerns raised in the background report on Senator Tower that I am unable in good conscience to support his nomination.

I voted against this nomination in the Armed Services Committee last Thursday and I intend to vote against this nomination when it comes to a vote here on the Senate floor. My concerns about Senator Tower's qualifications fall into three general categories: First, relationship to defense contractors; second, personal behavior; and third, alcohol abuse.

The committee reviewed questions concerning Senator Tower's work as a paid consultant for several major defense contractors. Questions have been raised about the basis for his large fees, potential conflict-of-interest changes, and his ability to implement needed changes in the Pentagon. President Bush himself has called for a higher standard for his appointees, urging them to avoid even the appearance of conflict of interest. I cannot conclude, based on the evidence available to the committee, that Senator Tower's defense consulting constitutes on overwhelming problem. However, I must concede that I am extremely uncomfortable about the immediacy with which Senator Tower assumed his role as consultant to several major defense contractors after concluding his service as strategic offensive arms negotiator. This disturbing lack of judgment by Senator Tower contributes to the perception that he used public office for private gain. President Bush's higher standard, I believe, dictates that nominees avoid even the appearance of conflict of interest. This issue takes on special importance in light of the damage done to the Defense Department by recent procurement scandals.

Over the last 10 weeks, the country has been buffeted with a string of stories about Senator Tower's relationships with women. In my review of the record, I did not find powerful, specific evidence of the alleged liaisons, encounters, and relationships. But I did find sufficient cumulative evidence to trouble me about the nominee's attitude toward women, as well as about his judgment and discretion. While I believe that an individual has the right to conduct his personal life as he sees fit, the Office of the Secretary of Defense demands a higher standard of discretion and judgment.

The U.S. Armed Services have been asked to fully integrate women into the force, treating them equally in all ways, with the exception of combat eligibility. I have visited many bases and ships, and at each one have been struck by the pride with which women—now constituting roughly one-tenth of our forces—are being integrated into the services, by the pride with which they serve, and by the commitment of our commanding officers to reach the goal of completely equal treatment. But the job is far from complete; serious problems still exist with the status and treatment of women in the military. Just last year, a Navy commander was dismissed for unacceptable behavior toward women. The Department of Defense has set a policy that women be treated as equals, not objects. The Secretary of Defense sets an example for millions of women and men in uniform and must be beyond reproach.

Based on the information available to the committee, there has clearly been a pattern of alcohol abuse in Senator Tower's life. The concerns raised on this score are, in my view, extremely serious. Were the nominee being considered for a sensitive military command in the armed services, the information contained in the FBI report would be sufficient to deny him that job. Surely, we should demand no less from our Secretary of Defense, who is below only the President in the military chain of command and who holds a position involving great personal pressures.

Further, the armed services have implemented a far-reaching program to combat alcoholism. Confirming a nominee with a pattern of alcohol abuse as Secretary of Defense would undercut these efforts and send a contradictory message to the people serving in our armed forces about the seriousness of alcohol abuse.

Senator Tower's public pledge on national television last weekend not to drink any alcoholic beverages if confirmed as Secretary of Defense has not changed my view of his overall fitness to serve in that role. In voting against Senator Tower's nomination last week in committee, I based my decision on several factors which in the aggregate left me with considerable doubt about Senator Tower's judgment and discretion. The pledge does not alter the body of evidence made available to the committee, nor the doubts surrounding Senator Tower's qualifications.

Finally, Mr. President, I would like to try to answer the question of "where is the smoking gun?" There is no smoking gun in all of this—our task would be easier if there were. But the ground is littered with a substantial number of spent cartridges. Sorting through these is the challenge we face. Honest men and women can disagree, and we have.

This decision has not been an easy one for me or any member of the Senate Committee on Armed Services. The Office of Secretary of Defense is not to be taken lightly, nor is the Senate's constitutional role in "advise and consent" regarding Presidential nominations for that office. Article 2 of the constitution is very clear on this point, and we should not let ourselves be any less clear.

Some Senators have suggested that the President possesses nearly an absolute right to have his nominee confirmed. Why then, I ask, does the Senate even bother to consider executive nominations? If we are meant only to rubber stamp a President's choice, we should dispense with the entire charade of a shared role. But as long as the Constitution explicitly calls for a Senate role in this executive function, we have an obligation to take that responsibility seriously. And that means carefully reviewing all considerations and making a balanced determination. Our oath of office binds us to uphold the Constitution, it is not a loyalty pledge to the President.

Now let me turn to the process the committee has followed, and some of the rhetoric in the floor debate about that process. Statements have been made that the FBI reports do not contain specific incidents of Senator Tower's abuse of alcohol in the 1970's, and more importantly, in the 1980's. These statements have suggested that we are "hiding behind T1, 13, He/She," that there are no specifics, and that we are operating on hearsay and unsubstantiated allegations.

These statements are simply not true. The record is replete with specifics, in the 1970's and in the 1980's, specific instances, told to the FBI by specific and identified individuals. Yes, some people asked not to be identified and, therefore, show up in the FBI reports as "T1, 13, He/She." This is the way the checking system works. These allegations have been investigated by the FBI. Some of them proved to be unsubstantiated, some the opposite. But it is simply untrue to state that there are no specifics in the FBI record—there are specific instances cited for the last decade and for this one.

Now the question can be asked, "Well, what are the specifics? " This is an unfair and inappropriate question, since we all know that the FBI report was developed on the basis of confidentiality and is intended to remain so. It is totally inappropriate for us to compromise this confidentiality in any way, by citing allegations that have proven wrong, or allegations that are clearly dealt with in the record. If those of us who oppose this nomination started selectively leaking some of this classified information in the light in which we interpret it, the other side would cry foul—and appropriately so.

Charges of blatant partisanship have been leveled at the Democrats who voted against Senator Tower's nomination. This is grossly unfair to the chairman, SAM NUNN, who has always conducted himself, and the Senate Armed Services Committee under his chairmanship, in a nonpartisan manner. The committee vote did split along party lines, but I do not believe that any Democrats sought or seek to make the Tower nomination a partisan affair.

Senate Democrats have, after all, voted unanimously to confirm 12 of President Bush's nominations. But in the case of Senator Tower, serious concerns have surfaced—sufficiently serious that most Democrats find themselves unable in good faith to support his nomination to this senstive post. Most Republicans feel the President should have his way.

Mr. President, we will face enormous challenges in national security policy in the years ahead. Budgetary constraints will demand that we make very difficult choices among competing claims for resources. And a new style of Soviet leadership poses significant opportunities and challenges in East-West relations.

Let us now move forward, receive a new nomination, ratify that choice and get on with the grave responsibilities of redefining our military's—and our country's—relationship to a rapidly changing world.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that following my statement, the editorial in this morning's newspaper, the op-ed piece by Senator NUNN in the Washington Post, as well as other editorials, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, March 3, 1989]

SENATOR NUNN REPLIES: WE ARE NOT BEING UNFAIR

(By Sam Nunn)

In a recent editorial on the Tower nomination, The Post stated that "much more needs to be stated for anyone not privy to the secret material on John Tower to be able to make an intelligent assessment of it." This statement goes to the heart of one of the major problems involved in this nomination: the use—and confidentiality—of the lengthy FBI report on its background investigation of John Tower.

First, I would emphasize that this report is the property of the executive branch. It was only with great reluctance that the White House agreed to make it available to the full Senate. The White House insisted upon a very restricted access arrangement under which only senators and a handful of trusted aides could review it, and then only if they read it in a secure room in the Capitol rather than the convenience of their offices.

In a cover letter accompanying the report, White House Counsel C. Boyden Gray warned of serious consequences if this report were made public: "The documents we will provide are extremely sensitive. Their disclosure could jeopardize the privacy interests of Senator Tower and others, the confidentiality of FBI sources, and our ability to recruit qualified candidates for positions of governmental service."

Senators opposed to the nomination who have respected the terms under which they were afforded access to the documents now find themselves being criticized for not making public specific material from the report supporting the committee findings on alcohol abuse and indiscretions. If, after considering the precedent and the effect on future FBI background checks, the White House chooses to release this report, all the allegations can be openly debated. However, in saying that the burden for laying all the facts out in the open rests with me, the Post errs. That judgment rests entirely with the president, the attorney general and the director of the FBI.

Some critics of the Armed Services Committee's vote on this nomination also assail the majority for allegedly relying solely on anonymous and unfounded allegations in reaching its decision in opposition to this nomination. The specter of McCarthyism has even been raised in recent days.

I want to make it very clear that there are sources who agreed to give their names on the record as well as those who requested anonymity in this report. It should also be clearly understood that Sen. Tower was afforded the opportunity both by the committee and the FBI to respond to allegations raised in the course of the nominating process. Sen. Tower responded to a number of the allegations in the closed sessions of the committee. In the case of every serious, specific allegation in the FBI file, the FBI followed up with an interview with Sen. Tower in which he was given every opportunity to rebut the charges. In addition, there were a number of committee concerns which were resolved in Sen. Tower's favor by the FBI report.

I would also note that while it is true that FBI reports often contain confusing and contradictory information, presidents have on many occasions refrained from nominating someone based on an FBI report. If, as some suggest, it is unfair for the Senate to use FBI reports as a basis for rejecting a nominee, is it also unfair for the president to use FBI reports to disqualify an individual from further consideration?

Consider the alternative. Our committee could have decided at an early stage to dispense with its traditional reliance on the FBI and conducted its own full background check. We could have called hundreds of witnesses, put them under oath and questioned them at great length. We could have formed teams of investigators, dispatched them to all corners of the globe and subpoenaed hotel receipts, bar tabs, airline manifests and countless other material evidence—all in an attempt to investigate every serious charge.

This would not, however, have been responsive to The Post's call for a full public disclosure, since the nature of most testimony would have required executive sessions. There would have been one decided advantage: members could have looked the witnesses in the eye and cross-examined them. As a lawyer concerned about fairness, I would prefer this procedure. But there would have been serious disadvantages: with the very large number of charges in this nomination, the process would have taken months and diverted the committee and the executive branch from their basic governmental tasks.

The nomination of John Tower is not a trial, nor can the Senate conduct its review as if it were. Rather, the Senate has no realistic alternative but to read the FBI report, keeping in mind all the while that it is full of conflicts and contradictions, firsthand observations as well as hearsay. In casting their votes, however, senators will exercise their judgment based on a careful review of all the information available to them, and not just the FBI report.

After my own review of this record, I have concluded that John Tower should not be confirmed as secretary of defense. This is a highly personal conclusion for me. I recognize that people of good will can reasonably come to an opposite judgment.

I do believe, however, that if senators weigh the evidence of this case with objectivity and dispassion, they will conclude that the president would be best advised to find another nominee. In three cases—use of alcohol, behavior toward women, and conflict of interest—Sen. Tower falls short of the standards which must be demanded of those who would bear the awesome responsibilities of this position.

I believe that the weight of the evidence shows:

1. John Tower had a serious drinking problem in the 1970's—a point which the nominee and the White House now acknowledge—and that this pattern of alcohol abuse continued throughout the 1980s. I can find no point in time when the nominee acknowledged and dealt with this problem. I do not believe our nation can afford to take the risk that John Tower's drinking problems are all in the past.

2. The committee found no findings of liaisons with female foreign nationals, and hence no security violations that such activities would entail. Nor does the record support the allegation that the nominee exerted sexual pressure on employees and associates of the opposite sex. However, the committee found examples of indiscreet conduct toward women by Sen. Tower which call into question his judgment and his ability to set an appropriate example for the men and women in uniform.

3. The committee also believes John Tower showed very poor judgment when he chose to provide consulting services to defense contractors on arms control matters immediately after serving as an arms control negotiator. Although there is no evidence that Sen. Tower provided his clients with classified information, this situation created the appearance of using public office for private gain and casts doubt on his ability to command public confidence in the integrity of the Pentagon's acquisition system.

On Feb. 28, President Bush criticized the Senate for making such an issue of the "perception" of a conflict of interest. Yet in one of his first speeches after his inauguaration, President Bush said that "the guiding principle will be simply to know right from wrong, to act in accordance with what is right, and to avoid even the appearance of what is wrong." And in a new conference a week later, he noted that "we're in a different time now" and that "what might be legal and might be perfectly sound ethically might have to be altered given this new approach because of perception."

There is much in John Tower's record to commend. I believe that John Tower is a loyal patriotic American who has a solid record of public service. I know that he is dedicated to our nation's security.

That, however, is not sufficient reason to confirm John Tower as secretary of defense. The man who fills this office must be a person suited by personal conduct, discretion and judgment to serve second only to the president in the chain of command over military forces and nuclear weapons. The secretary of defense must be prepared to carry out his military command responsibilities 24 hours of each day, as underscored by crises such as the 1968 capture of the USS Pueblo, the 1983 bombing of the Marine barracks in Beirut and the 1988 shoot-down of Iran Air Flight 655 by the USS Vincennes—all of which occurred in the dead of night.

Lastly, the secretary of defense must set the highest leadership example for the men and women in uniform and the civilian employees of the Defense Department. Leadership must be established from the top down. Standards must be set from the top down. If we want the sergeant at his post on the DMZ in Korea or the lieutenant standing alert with her Strategic Air Command KC-135 refueling tanker at a stateside base to meet the high standards asked of those who wear our nation's uniform, the Senate must make that clear in the individuals it confirms for the position of secretary of defense.

[From the Army Times, Feb. 13, 1989]

TOWER SHOULD GO

John Tower should withdraw his nomination to be the next secretary of defense.

Out of concern for the military, which the former Texas senator clearly loves, he should step aside. Tower's public position has been so compromised by the agonizing process by which he was nominated and is being confirmed—as of this writing the Senate Armed Services Committee has postponed its vote on the matter—that he cannot be the strong spokesman the Defense Department needs now.

We are reluctant to pass judgment on Tower's character per se. It takes a judge with more moral clarity than we would claim to reach a definitive verdict on the charges of womanizing and high living that have surfaced along Tower's troubled road to the Pentagon post. Edward Kennedy has survived much more serious charges to serve a long term in the Senate. Are the standards for a defense secretary so much higher than for a senator?

More troubling and more at issue is Tower's position as a consultant to defense contractors. No one has claimed Tower acted illegally in receiving big fees from defense firms in return for what, by Tower's own description, was precious little real information. But the speed and greed with which Tower spun through the revolving door is appalling.

Though the charges against Tower may be unproven, they undeniably create the impression of a man much too cozy with the Pentagon's worst ways of doing business. Indeed, he is almost a caricature of how most people see the Defense Department, a kind of Mr. Military-Industrial Complex.

Balancing this is the "Nixon-goes-to-China" argument. That is, Tower will be able to tame the Pentagon's wasteful ways and make reforms stick because he is a such a long-term supporter of the military. In his confirmation bearings, Tower said, "I understand we must live within constraints. I am not such a mindless hawk that I would come to you and ask you for a substantial increase in defense expenditure when I know it is not going to happen."

Tower recognized that he would be viewed with suspicion in asking for defense increases. But how then can he credibly support the current defense budget, which calls for a 2 percent real increase in spending? And how can he make the argument—which needs desperately to be made by someone—that national security may be more important than this year's Gramm-Rudman number? The United States is about to enter the two most important arms negotiations in history and needs to stick to its guns to reach a successful conclusion.

And to maintain a national consensus on military spending, the Pentagon badly needs to have its image resurrected from the Golgotha where spare parts scandals and Operation Ill Wind and pique at our allies and many other problems have marooned it. Is John Tower the man to do that?

Alas, no.

It seems cruel to deprive a man with the skills to do a job he desperately wants to do of the opportunity to make good. And we may be making a moot point, as the Senate seems intent on confirming Tower come hell or high water.

But George Bush, who says he cares deeply about ethics in government, might want to reconsider. The president's sense of loyalty may be too strong.

Or Tower may summon personal courage of his own—it would take uncommon courage to refuse now the job he wants so much—to step aside. It might be the best help he can give to his friends in the military.

[From the Defense News, Feb. 6, 1989]

TOWER SHOULD STEP ASIDE

Mr. John Tower should withdraw his name from consideration to be defense secretary of the United States. It would be a service to the country and to the president. Withdrawal would be the act of a seasoned politician who understands that the best interests of the nation sometimes require personal sacrifice by those who would help lead it.

Withdrawal is necessary because the record of Mr. Tower's professional life raises substantive doubt that he can perform with utmost effectiveness at a time when defense priorities and the Defense Department each are undergoing periods of vital, but delicate, change.

The nation's ability to mount a robust defense depends, over the long term, on the support of the American people. Support for defense spending is declining. The public is raising legitimate questions about the relationship between the Defense Department and the defense industry. Further, defense no longer is the nation's top priority as was the case in 1981 when President Reagan accelerated the defense buildup begun by his predecessor. Today, defense is one of a number of national priorities, which include reduction of the federal deficit and improvement of the nation's trade balances.

What is needed is a defense secretary with the political skills to raise public confidence in the Pentagon and the acquisition process. He should have the vision to unite NATO's quarrelsome allies and address their changing and diverging defense priorities in light of Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev's entreaties. The new secretary must possess the diplomatic and leadership skills to build an international consensus for the president's defense agenda.

While in the Senate, Mr. Tower earned a reputation as a tough, abrasive deal maker. Even his allies do not characterize him as one much interested in the opposing views of others. He demonstrated little interest in improving the acquisition system or in balancing the appetites of former Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger with other, equally important, needs of the nation.

But it is his job since 1986 as a defense consultant that is most troubling. In about two years, Mr. Tower earned $1 million as a consultant for Rockwell International, Martin Marietta, LTV, Textron, British Aerospace, Astrotech and Hicks and Associates, a consulting firm that advises, among others, the Northrop Corp. These firms are makers of the B-1 and B-2 bombers, the MX and Midgetman missiles, and a wide array of the Pentagon's most important conventional weapons.

Sen. Sam Nunn, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, summarized the issue this way: "Frankly, the difficulty here is not the fact that you have worked for a defense contractor or been a consultant" but that Mr. Tower represented "five or six or seven of the major corporations . . . If you were to [excuse] yourself from [Pentagon discussions involving] all of them, you couldn't be secretary of defense . . . We have a perception problem. The question of conflict is one that usually relates to continuning financial interests. The other is perception . . . I know you to be an honest person. But I do worry about the perception."

The senator worries because he knows that today's public perception is tomorrow's political reality. That is why President Bush established ethics in government as a priority of his administration. After 24 years in the Senate, Mr. Tower also understands the link between the public's perception and its support for defense. His decision to become a defense consultant was an explicit statement about the path he had chosen for himself.

The principle task of the next defense secretary is to build public confidence that the Pentagon is being well managed and that defense dollars are being carefully spent. The defense secretary must be an independent voice of force, authority and reason.

There is ample reason to doubt whether Mr. Tower is the man for these times.

[From the Navy Times, Mar. 6, 1989]

THE TOWER VOTE

President Bush gambled and apparently lost on the nomination of former Sen. John Tower to be secretary of Defense. The Senate Armed Services Committee sent the nomination to the Senate floor with a recommendation not to confirm.

The vote split along party lines—11 Democrats against Tower, nine Republicans voting in favor of their former colleague. If the partisan pattern holds, the nomination will be defeated in the Senate where Democrats hold a 55-45 majority.

Critics of committee chairman Sam Nunn, D-Ga., say with some bitterness that he allowed rumor and innuendo about Tower's social life to rule the day. They suggest that Nunn had his way with Defense when Frank C. Carlucci was secretary, and now he bristles at the thought of so formidable an adversary as Tower taking over that post.

Those charges themselves seem the fruit of politics and bruised egos. As Navy Times went to press, no version of the FBI investigation into Tower's personal habits had been released. The public has no way to assess the material that swayed Democratic conservatives like Nunn and Sen. John Glenn, D-Ohio, to vote against the nomination. But Sen. John Warner's observation that reasonable men can disagree on the implications of the FBI reports is no ringing denunciation of Nunn's leadership on this issue.

Both Nunn and Tower care deeply about national security and those serving in the armed forces. Tower served with distinction in the Senate for 24 years. He's been a strong supporter of the Sea Services. As a master chief in the Naval Reserve, he holds a special affection for the Navy.

But the Senate has an obligation to vote down a nomination when sufficient questions of character are raised. All those investigations were opportunities to allay the Democrats' concerns. They did not.

The vote in committee came down to two issues. The first is whether Tower is a good choice to handle the tough decisions ahead for defense. He has the brains and background to handle the job.

The second, however, involves leadership, and that includes personal habits. "Will we demand less of our secretary of Defense than we do of our people in uniform?," Glenn asked.

We shouldn't. And military people need to know we won't. The Defense secretary should be, and should be known to be, a man of upstanding character. President Bush should nominate another to lead the Defense Department.

If he does not, the full Senate should reject the nomination.

[From the Air Force Times, Feb. 20, 1989]

NOT TOWER

The armed forces are under great pressure. They are being forced to find ways to hold down spending without endangering the nation, and they must rebuild public trust in the flawed procurement system. To do this, they need a strong, widely respected leader.

John G. Tower is the wrong man for the job.

Let's set aside for the moment the questions that have been raised about his drinking habits and his relationships with women. And let's even assume that the most recent FBI investigation into his financial affairs yields no evidence of illegality. There are other, compelling reasons Tower should not be secretary of defense.

It is clear that defense spending will be constrained and that the secretary of defense will have to engage in intricate and delicate negotiations with Congress and within the executive branch. To assure that the resources devoted to defense are adequate, but not excessive, the nation needs a Pentagon leader who is credible.

Tower is not. He has accepted more than three-quarters of a million dollars in payments from U.S. defense contractors for various consulting services he has rendered to them since he retired from the Senate.

In testimony before his former colleagues, he has offered to "recuse" himself—that is, not be involved in—certain decisions involving projects with which he was directly associated. But that is not a feasible solution. It would mean, in effect, that every time such a project required a decision by the secretary of defense, he would have to leave the room. That's no way to run the Pentagon, especially now, when excruciatingly difficult decisions must be made. There is too much at stake to allow vital decisions to be handled by underlings because the secretary of defense's chair is empty.

Unfortunately, Tower's lack of credibility is not limited to issues on which he worked as a consultant, and that is the most significant problem.

Tower is so closely associated with the defense industry that many people will question virtually any statement he makes on defense issues. His supporters argue that Tower knows defense issues and he knows Congress. That is true. But this knowledge is worthless if it is perceived to be tainted by bias.

Why should the people of the United States accept as the leader of their defenses a man whose effectiveness has been impaired by his past? Surely there is one person among the 250 million Americans who is both qualified to be secretary of defense and unfettered by ties to the defense industry?

Tower's nomination shows poor judgment by President Bush. It should be withdrawn. Failing that, it should be rejected.

Mr. COATS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. COATS. Mr. President, I think every new Senator hopes to ease gradually and gracefully and without controversy into his new duties. I found myself, as a new member of the Armed Services Committee, thrown into the middle of what has become the topic of the day, the great controversy that surrounds the confirmation of John Tower.

For the last several weeks, I have been forced to deal with the personal affairs and effects of an individual's life, spent many, many hours reading the voluminous accounts of allegations, of FBI investigations, listening to witnesses, and trying to form an opinion as to how I should handle this matter.

I think my lack of previous exposure to the issue, my unfamiliarity with the nominee, is probably an advantage. Unlike others on the committee, I did not know John Tower. I did not serve with John Tower. He never did me any favors; he never did me any harm. In fact, we had never met before this occasion. So I believe I approached the nomination with the personal detachment that is valuable in a juror and important in my efforts to examine the evidence in as an objective a manner as possible.

In working through this question and in examining the evidence and listening to the witnesses and reading the reports, I was reminded of one very important question over and over. Just exactly what was I supposed to be doing? I know the simple answer, advice and consent. That is our constitutional duty. But trying to define what that meant and what my responsibilities were has been a very, very difficult process. I am a lawyer. I asked my constituents to forgive me for that, but I am a lawyer, and I would have known what to do if John Tower had been on trial. The rules of evidence would have applied. Witnesses would been called and cross-examined. Innocence would have been assumed, in the absence of any proof to the contrary. But the Tower hearing has been like no trial I have ever seen. Witnesses are mostly anonymous. Allegations have been kept secret. The defendant, in this case John Tower, was never allowed to confront his accusers, or know even what they charged, except by picking up the paper the next moring and reading a new allegation. Under these extraordinary procedures, where hearsay is given the weight of proof, the case against John Tower, in my opinion, has not been made. Witnesses gave us conflicting testimony; allegations have been vague and, for the most part, unsubstantiated. The charges remain unconvincing. To date, in my opinion, none of the charges would begin to prove the case against John Tower in a court of law. Proof, it turns out, is what some committee members were not after. They referred to again and again, as we just heard previously on the floor, the concept of perceptions, perceptions of impropriety, perceptions of insobriety, perceptions of insensitivity.

One member of our committee explained before voting against John Tower: "However those perceptions are formed * * * by the nominee's own actions * * * (4) by the press reporting their interpretations * * * whether we like it not, the perceptions are there and they are real, and I think they have to be considered." "Once again," he concluded, "it is perception, and perceptions of a leader determine much of the effectiveness of that person's ability to lead. That may not be fair. I agree with that. That may not be fact. But the perception is there, and we are still looking for leadership, and that means leadership by example."

Is this what advise and consent means? Is it a trade in allegations and perceptions, a weighing of media damage and public opinion, and because the public has the perception that John Tower is not qualified, regardless of whether the facts substantiate that perception, that that weighing of perception is enough to deny him the nomination?

Forget John Tower for a minute. He may or may not be the best person for the job of Defense Secretary. I am convinced that he is, but that is not the point I am trying to make. I think there is a principle involved here somewhere, a principle concerning how the Senate should treat the President's Cabinet appointments, a principle about what nomination means.

Fortunately, it is not a debate that we have to conduct in a vacuum. Advice and consent was given considerable attention by the founders. Alexander Hamilton wrote that the Senate should approve a President's nominee, unless there were "special and strong reasons for refusal;" further, that when the Senate oversteps its proper bounds, the result is "the full display of all the private and party likings and dislikes, partialities and antipathies, attachments and animosities, which are felt by those who compose the assembly."

Thomas Jefferson narrowly limited just cause for Senate rejection of a nominee, "I have always considered control of the Senate as meant to prevent any bias or favoritism in the President toward his own relations, his own religion, toward particular States."

Senator George Cabot, of Massachusetts, wrote in 1799, "I have always rejected the idea of nonconcurrence with a nomination merely because the nominee was less suitable for the office than thousands of others: He must be positively unfit for office, and the public duty not likely to be performed by him, to justify in my mind the nonconcurrence. It has always appeared to me that a departure from this principle would soon wrest from the President altogether the essence of the nominating power, which is the power of selecting offices."

"Positively unfit for office, and the public duty not likely to be performed by him," a very specific and a very limited standard and a standard that I believe has been the norm in the Senate from the beginning.

Mr. President, I submit to the Senate that nothing in the record presented to us begins to prove the case that John Tower is positively unfit for office or that the public duty is not likely to be performed by him. In fact, we have had eloquent testimony from Members on both sides of the aisle that John Tower is a person for whom the public duty is likely to be performed and performed very well, that a more competent, a more experienced, a more qualified, a more knowledgeable Cabinet Secretary for the Department of Defense would be hard to find.

It is interesting to me that when Harry Hopkins was appointed to be Secretary of Commerce in 1939, Senator Walsh of Massachusetts, though criticizing the politics of the WPA under Hopkins, said that the President's nomination to his Cabinet should not be rejected "except for grave and unmistakable disqualification." Senator Glass admitted he disapproved of just about everything Hopkins had done, but that the President should have the "widest possible latitude" in the choice of his Cabinet, and "if he wants men of the Hopkins type of advise him, I think he ought to be allowed to select them."

And when Henry Wallace was nominated to be Secretary of Commerce in 1946, Walter Lippmann wrote that for the Senate to shoot down a President's selection in the absence of some compelling disqualification was "a usurpation by the Senate of an executive function" and "incompatible with our form of government."

But even apart from all this—apart from Hamilton and Jefferson and the long tradition of the Senate—there is another decisive reason why advise and consent should not be a gauge of public perceptions: because allegations are cheap and reputations are valuable.

If Senate decisions are made on the weight of allegations rather than the weight of evidence; and if those unsubstantiated perceptions can be transformed by a string of charges, none of which are publicly proven; the potential for abuse is enormous. Scurrilous accusation becomes a potent political tool.

Something is wrong, I submit, badly wrong, when it becomes that easy to ruin a man.

I stated in my remarks before the Armed Services Committee just prior to the vote that we may be in danger of establishing a new precedent of setting a new standard for public office, that that precedent would be that the weight of allegation and not the weight of proof is what determines whether a man is fit for office.

Simply put, I believe a President should be given his Cabinet choice unless there is as the Senate precedent has indicated prior to this nomination, some decisive and compelling disqualification. And a decisive disqualification, it seems to me, requires decisive proof.

Mark Twain advised, "First get the facts. You can always distort them later."

I am new to the whole confirmation process, to the process of advise and consent. But it seems to me we have skipped the first step and gone directly to the second. It was impossible for me to conclude otherwise when the Armed Services Committee gave its verdict: charges unproven. Defendant convicted.

Mr. President, I would hope the Senate would not reach this same verdict.

I thank you for the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WIRTH). The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I stated at a news conference on Tuesday when I announced my decision to vote "no" against the Tower nomination that I did not intend to try this case. It is not a pleasant task.

Listening to floor debate this morning, I found myself in a position similar to that of the distinguished chairman of our Armed Services Committee, uncomfortable in passing judgment on our former colleague. Like the chairman, I was initially favorably disposed toward this nomination. But a careful review of the FBI reports has changed that initial disposition. Like the chairman, I cannot in good conscience vote to confirm John Tower, of Texas.

I was pursued to appear on Nightline and two morning shows and three Sunday talk shows, and I turned them all down. I did not seek a high profile in this debate. But I was tempted to go on all of these talk shows when I heard my friend, the distinguished minority leader, Senator DOLE, say, "HOLLINGS is just looking for headlines."

When we are required to pass judgment on a colleague as we are today in the case of Senator Tower, I do not believe anybody seeks out a high profile. Senators would prefer to vote and get it over with as promptly as possible because the Record is not a very tasteful thing.

The Senator from Idaho at one point made an analogy to the TV miniseries Lonesome Dove. In his plea for bipartisanship, he oh so nonpartisanly charged that the Democrats are burying John Tower at the Rio Grande.

We say in law that he who seeks equity must do equity. Likewise, he who seeks bipartisanship must be bipartisanship and is ill-advised to make a partisan accusation that somebody is burying John Tower at the Rio Grande.

I have voted for George Bush three times. I voted for Mr. Bush to be head of our Central Intelligence Agency, to be our envoy to China, and to be our United Nations Ambassador. You can look at my extensive record of positive, encouraging remarks about the President-elect right through December and January. We all talk at civic clubs. My comments were most hopeful concerning Mr. Bush because with respect to Government, I have much, much higher regard for President Bush than I did for President Reagan. President Reagan frankly did not like the Government, and he thought his role or task was to come here and disassemble it, abolish the Department of Education, abolish the Department of Energy, send responsibilities back to the cities, the counties, the States; just get rid of the Federal Government.

In contrast, President Bush has served in all the roles I have just enumerated plus Congressman, plus Vice President, and on down the line. So his record is like mine, a lifetime in Government service. And I respect and appreciate that.

I had hoped that President Bush would act more decisively on the economy. I am disappointed there. But that is another subject.

The point is that I have been favorably disposed to the new President. The Senator from Georgia shares that view. We had been visited by the President in our own party caucus. I had not before seen that happen—a Republican President calling on the Democrats in caucus.

Similarly I have have been taken on a tour of the second floor at the White House by Mr. Bush. I had not been there for 8 years. Senator NUNN and I were shown the exercise room where Ronnie Reagan did his weight lifting. We had two little Bush grandchildren there. There is no one we all admire more than Mrs. Bush. We had a wonderful evening and it was one aspect of that period of good feelings we call the Presidential honeymoon.

I had two Cabinet appointments to consider as the chairman of the Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee. I had the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of Transportation. At the time I got the nomination of Mr. Mosbacher as the Secretary, I was immediately called to task by Common Cause. They protested, "Do not even have a hearing." I rejected the notion of turning the Mosbacher nomination into a political carnival or inquisition for Common Cause or anyone else. I told them so, and we moved forward in spite of Common Cause's objection, and I was commended by my colleagues on the Republican side.

My purpose is not self-congratulation, but the Record will show that the minority joined in the praise of our handling of the Mosbacher nomination and the bipartisan way we did it.

And the same was true of Mr. Skinner.

The White House said that the FBI is the servant of the White House. That is part of our problem right now. The FBI is the servant of the White House and they have conducted their investigation according to the wishes of their master. Likewise, the White House has strictly regulated and controlled Senators' access to the FBI reports. Originally, only the chairman and the ranking member were entitled to those reports. And if any of our colleagues wanted to see them, they just could not, nor could anybody else. And that was the White House rule.

Well, it disturbed one of my colleagues because in the Judiciary Committee, when reviewing judicial appointments, all Senators, not just the chairman and the ranking member see the reports.

But, anyway, we ironed that issue out in a bipartisan fashion. I only comment so as to emphasize that opportunities, if we wanted to be partisan, have existed on many occasions already in this session.

But I think it is for the good of the Government that the new administration get started quickly and get its appointments through the process. And the record shows that we have confirmed 13 or more top appointees already, all unanimously voted for by every Democrat—all the Democrats.

So what is different with Tower? What is different with Tower? Well, the FBI reports speak loud and clear on Senator Tower. Their message leaves no question. And that is another reason why I felt obliged to answer Senator STEVENS who spoke a few moments ago. You know, we always say, when we do not agree with a particular Senator, "I have great respect." Well, I not only have great respect, I like TED STEVENS. He is one of the finest gentlemen and one of the finest individuals I have ever met. Our friendship goes back to when he first came to the Senate. And, yes, we have socialized and we have traveled together. But he said that the witnesses interviewed by the FBI were not credible.

Well, that goes to the root of one our difficulties with the FBI reports. The confidentiality requirement is a roadblock in this debate. I go back to the servant-master relationship between the FBI and the President of the United States who has the sole control of confidentiality. And, I emphasize that national security is not at issue. There is no national security issue here. In fact, for the national good, it would be best if the President of the United States would immediately release all of these FBI reports, if the committee would release all of its reports. Then we would cut out the shadowboxing. As a colleague said recently to me, "If they release the report, this whole thing would be over in 1 hour's time." Mr. Tower would be back in Texas not to be buried in the Rio Grande but to be buried in the truth of the record.

I request respectfully that the President release the FBI reports. I plead with him to release the report. I implore him to release the report. I demand that he release the report.

I urge that he release those reports because it is precisely the Senate's character that is being assassinated, not John Tower's, and I am sick and tired of it. And that is why I am here on this floor. When you try to do a conscientious job, Mr. Tower's advocates leap to their feet and invoke the confidentiality. They protest, "You can't say anthing about what's in it, you can't characterize it, you can't do anything." But—and here is the double standard—the President can say its charges have been gunned down. The President can say it is innuendo, the President can say rumor, and so on.

I say with no equivocation. The reports contain facts. And I know facts. I have practiced law for 40 years. Those reports contain categorical facts and there are too many of them.

Yet I quote the Senator from New Hampshire, Senator WARREN RUDMAN. "There is nothing in the report which indicates any impairment whatsoever of Mr. Tower due to alcohol," said Senator WARREN RUDMAN, New Hampshire Republican. "Nothing; zero."

Well, if he has the right to say "nothing," "zero," "not a single instance," then I have the right to say "ten times," "twenty times," "thirty times" during the 1980's. I will make a bet with any Senator. I will give them odds 10 to 1, $100 to $1,000, that if the FBI reports are made public, I will be proved correct when I said "at least ten times." And that is what bothers this Senator. That is what bothers the Senator from Georgia and everybody else who has not retreated to the bunker of partisanship.

I really admire our majority leader, GEORGE MITCHELL. He has put no pressure on Democrats to vote as a block. I never received any persuasion or pressure. I was asked whether I talked to Senator NUNN from the time the committee voted until I announced my position after having read the FBI reports earlier this week. I said, "No, I had not."

As you well know, I am hardly Senator NUNN's stooge—he and I differ on the ABM Treaty—but I am his admirer. And he has done an outstanding professional job in handling this nomination and in standing like a rock in the face of an outrageous partisan assault from Mr. Tower's defenders.

I am tired of hearing Republicans trying to frame this as a power grab by Senator NUNN or Senator NUNN's opening shot in the 1992 Presidential race. That is hogwash. He has had a job to do. He would love to have given this job to somebody else. He was not out to get John Tower; neither was I. Heck, I invited John Tower to address our Hibernian Society in Charleston. I thought a lot of him.

I guess it ought to be said at this point that there no longer is any senatorial club as envisioned by my colleague from Alaska. He lamented as to how we are losing the club. It is just not here. You do not get to see the other Senators. You see your staff—and maybe we are overstaffed here, overworked, and reworked. You have five breakfasts and eight dinners and seven other things, and by the time I finish my speech here I have to get back to the staff because they have four appointments waiting in the office. So the collegial relationships are a thing of the past.

They assign us a hideaway office. Senator Tower charged at the Press Club the other day that we stagger out of our hideaways to vote on issues of strategic deterrence. I do not believe I have been in my hideaway four times during the evening hours. So I hardly use it, and I tell my colleagues and my House Member friends: "I have a nice place in the Capitol. If you ever want to use it, you are welcome to use it." I do not use it. You cannot find time to get to it.

No, I never took a trip with Senator Tower. I did not know of his personal life. We all heard of it, the domestic difficulties. Similarly, with respect to his reputation with alcohol. I heard the talk. But I thought he had outgrown that behavior.

Now Senator STEVENS says that it is we who are on trial, that each of us is obliged to cite our personal observations of Senator Tower's indiscretions. But that is not the test. But on that record, no, I have not seen Senator Tower drunk, but I do not think that is my responsibility.

Indeed, I do not have sufficient experience with Senator Tower to judge him on the basis of my firsthand experience. As I said, we do not have that old Senate club and we do not see each other that frequently. The American people ought not to be led to believe that Senators are off in their hideaways having a party and drinking together.

What is unique about the Tower case is the extent and decisiveness of the FBI reports. I was just trying to remember this morning—I have been through the confirmation of Secretary of Defense Carlucci. I never heard anything about liquor or women with him. I went through the confirmation of Secretary Weinberger. I never heard anything about liquor or women with Weinberger. I went through the confirmation of Harold Brown. I never heard anything about liquor or women with Harold Brown. I went through the confirmation of Donald Rumsfeld. I never heard anything about Donald Rumsfeld and liquor and women. Such facts were not in the record that I remember about Secretary Schlesinger, Secretary Richardson, Secretary Laird, Secretary Clifford, or Secretary McNamara.

But read the Army Times and Navy Times and Air Force Times and Defense News. Every newspaper that closely covers the Department of Defense, every one of them, says: Mr. Tower, step aside and let President Bush appoint someone else.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two editorials by George Will and Charles Krauthammer, appearing in the Washington Post earlier this week entitled, "Political Potshots With Empty Cartridges."

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 1, 1989]

THE TOWER AFFAIR

POLITICAL POTSHOTS . . .

(By Charles Krauthammer)

William Bennett, drug czar, has to pledge to give up cigarettes. John Tower, nominee for secretary of Defense, has to forswear alcohol. Next thing you know the secretary of Health and Human Services will be required to take a safe sex oath. The pursuit of virtue knows no bounds.

We are in the midst of a full-blown outbreak of congressional fastidiousness and the results are not pretty. Until now ritual renunciations, revelations and other humiliations were demanded of presidential candidates only. The practice has now been extended to Cabinet members. I will begin to enjoy the trend when its reach extends to Congress. But since Congress specializes in inventing standards of conduct for everyone save Congress, I will undoubtedly be denied the pleasure.

At least regarding potential presidents, this ransacking of the candidate's personal life has a shred of logic, since the presidency has become largely a symbolic office. (It will become even more so if the Senate denies the president his choice of Secretary of Defense.) And we want our symbols, like our celebrities, to fit our current fads and fancies. High among these are our moral fads and fancies. A current favorite is to see health as proof of good character and good hygiene as a sign of high moral virtue. (In 1987, for example, hardline conservatives tried to get the surgeon general to declare abortion harmful to the mother in the not unreasonable hope that, in the current climate, the best way to advance the anti-abortion cause is to find abortion unhealthy rather than immoral.)

It is one thing to have presidents undergo public trial of their personal habits. It is quite another to do the same to Cabinet secretaries. A Cabinet is not a symbolic body. The Defense secretary's job is not to be a role model for an ensign. It is to keep the ensign armed, trained and out of war. For that the secretary of Defense needs to be shrewd, tough and experienced. If he is a moral educator as well, fine, if he is not, who cares?

Many senators appear to care. They seem to accept the new standard for Cabinet service enunciated by Paul Weyrich, conservative activist and public scold. Writing Monday in the The Wall Street Journal, Weyrich explained that we Americans ought not be denied our "rightful expectation that public officials be people we can respect as honest and moral role models."

Now no one has called Tower dishonest. If the Weyrich standard for Cabinet fitness is to rule, we need two cabinets. The Role Model Cabinet would be peopled by paragons of virtue, Mother Teresa for HUD, Betty Ford for drug czar, Audie Murphy for Defense. The Real Cabinet would consist of grizzled veterans who can run things.

The role model theory of government is inane. A country that cannot draw on its reservoir of tough little bastards to fight its battles is a country impoverished. Those in need of moral education should turn to church. State has other functions.

In 200 years the Senate has rejected only eight presidential nominees for the Cabinet and never the nominee of a newly elected president. Rejection is a weighty political act. The "moral" argument for doing so in this case is based on criteria so ad hoc and so improvised that one is led to the conclusion that the argument is really political. Senate Democrats, led by Sam Nunn of Georgia, are showing George Bush who is in charge. The straight party-line vote in the Senate Armed Services Committee shows that senators were not giving their independent reading of the FBI report. They were following Nunn or Bush.

Tower has become a test of strength between the parties, between the branches and between Nunn and Bush. If Nunn wins, he becomes the most important arbiter of national security policy in the country after the president, and not far after him. He becomes de facto leader of the Congressional Democratic Party and a logical choice to take Bush on again, this time in 1992.

This would be an enormous political boost for Nunn. And yet his sober, self-effacing manner permits him, as no other politician, regularly to escape the charge of self-aggrandizement. Whatever he does, no matter how political, he remains Mr. National Interest.

Two years ago, he challenged the administration's interpretation of the ABM treaty. A few weeks later, he joined with majority leader Robert Byrd and other Democrats in proposing legislation that would have terminated the American reflagging of Kuwaiti vessels in the Persian Gulf within 80 days unless both houses of Congress expressly voted otherwise. The first was a questionable idea, given the delicate state of nuclear arms talks at the time. The second was simply a very bad idea.

In both cases Nunn was fighting for institutional prerogatives (the treaty- and war-making powers of Congress) that would not incidentally have enhanced his power as Congress' leader on national security issues. Now his aim is the first veto of a Cabinet member in 30 years, an even greater assertion of power.

The Democratic Party is increasingly shut out of presidential politics. Naturally, it wants to increase the power of Congress at the expense of the presidency. But that is not necessarily good for a country with an already weak chief executive. If he beats Bush this time, Nunn will present it as a victory for the national interest. But the whiff of ambition—institutional and personal—will be increasingly hard to disguise.

THE TOWER AFFAIR

. . . WITH EMPTY CARTRIDGES

(By George F. Will)

Sen. Tim Wirth (D-Colo.) voted against John Tower in the Armed Services Committee because, although there is no "smoking gun," the ground is covered with "empty cartridges." And Wirth worries that rumors (cartridges?) of Tower's "womanizing" set an "example" that might cause women in the military to be "discriminated against."

Wirth will not talk about specifics because that would be "unfair." We know everyone is trying to be fair.

Regarding the allegations, Sen. Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.) stresses quantity over quality. He voted against Tower because the "allegations" (cartridges?) come "from a great many unconnected sources."

Sen. Alan Dixon (D-Ill.) another quantity man, is impressed that "the firestorm of allegations" has not stopped. Many allegations are, he says, merely "rumors and innuendo," but (read this carefully) "other allegations offer cause for considerable alarm." Does Dixon think they are true? All he says is: "There may not be a smoking gun, but there is an abundance of smoke." Smoking cartridges, perhaps?

Sen. John Glenn (D-Ohio) says the "effectiveness" of an officeholder depends on "perceptions," and in Tower's case, "They may not be fair—I agree with that—may not be fact. But the perceptions are there." Thus a confirmation process that began purporting to pursue the truth ends by declaring the truth irrelevant.

However, Sen. John Breaux (D-La.) explains that we are witnessing senatorial idealism: "We ought to be looking for the very best we can find in the nation. The president has the right to go out and find that person, but the Senate has an obligation to determine whether in fact this is the best we can find out there in the whole country." So the Senate's ("we") preferences are at least of equal weight with those of the man who wins the presidential election.

Adding them up, the reasons for rejecting Tower include: alleged drunkenness that a senator serving with Tower claims never to have seen, but which most Democrats now say they believe on the basis of reports (cartridges?) gathered by the FBI. Undefined and undocumented "womanizing." The "appearance" of "conflicts of interest" (more about which in a moment). And the Senate thirst for "the best."

A rule: In Washington, when four reasons are given for doing something, the real reason is none of the four.

Sen. Sam Nunn (D-Ga.) was most worried about Tower's use of alcohol. Then Tower pledged not to touch it. Then Nunn changed his emphasis. Nunn was clear about only why he was not saying. "I'm not saying," he said that Tower as a private consultant improperly gave information to defense contractors. But "it's the appearance that is so bad."

Now, is it really asking too much to ask Nunn, who has rendered an emphatic judgment on Tower, to be comparably clear about his reasons for the judgment? It is simply smarmy for him to issue these simpering disclaimers ("I'm not saying . . .") while destroying a man's reputation, career and with studied ambiguities.

Does Nunn think Tower today has an alcohol problem? Has Nunn decided that Tower behaved unethically as a consultant? Nunn cannot decide, he should defer to presidential decision on Tower.

"I'm in a hopeless situation," Nunn said because he cannot reveal his reasons for finding Tower unfit. FBI reports are confidential. They also are often confusing, contradictory and inconclusive. Because the White House has characterized the reports differently from the way Nunn has, Nunn threatened to reopen the hearings and subpoena people for testimony under oath. This he says, would be "unfortunate."

Oh? For whom? Not Tower, who can hardly be more injured. It might be unfortunate for the patrons of The Monocle Restaurant because all the employees would be testifying. (One claims to have seen Tower drunk, a dozen say they never did.) And it would be interesting to hear from the man who says he saw Tower drunk in Washington on a day when Tower was in Pakistan, Texas and Seattle.

If it is fair to judge Tower for "appearances," it is as fair to note that Nunn "appears" to be taking this personally. As Nunn likes to say, I'm not saying that he is. So there is a "perception" that this is simply a power struggle. The perception may be fair, but we know how seriously Nunn and allies take perceptions.

Some Democrats are behaving the way some Republicans did between 1949 and 1952, when they had been too long with the sobering responsibility of executive power. As Democrats bandy "allegations," or something. Try substituting the phrase "allegations of communist sympathies" for "allegations of alcohol abuse" (or "womanizing" or "conflicts of interest"). Then see what you think of the flavor of this senatorial closemindedness. As some earlier senators (Joe McCarthy and Jenner and others) understand empty cartridges are the perfect ammunition for character assassinations.

Mr. HOLLINGS. George Will talks about "perceptions" and "empty cartridges." Mine are not empty. I wish they were. I am talking about facts. We are not dealing with fanciful things. I quote Charles Krauthamner:

The Defense Secretary's job is not to be a role model for an ensign. It is to keep the ensign armed, trained, and out of war. For that, the Secretary of Defense needs to be shrewd, tough, and experienced. If he is a moral educator as well, fine. If he is not, who cares?

We do, that's who. We have a high duty. It is ironical that this piece should be written in such a way to wrongly refute the DOD's own policy concerning the moral character of members of our Armed Forces. The DOD's policy is quite clear as the record will show. I ask unanimous consent that a summary prepared by the majority staff of the Senate Armed Services Committee on DOD's policy on alcohol abuse be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A SUMMARY BY THE MAJORITY STAFF OF THE COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES ON DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE POLICY ON ALCOHOL ABUSE

Department of Defense Directive 1010.4 provides the general policy toward alcohol abuse within the Department of Defense.

This Directive notes that "Alcohol and drug abuse is incompatible with the maintenance of high standards of performance, military discipline, and readiness." It is DoD policy to treat, counsel and rehabilitate alcohol abusers where possible. However, those alcohol abusers who cannot or will not be rehabilitated will not be disciplined or discharged.

Army Regulation 600-85 sums up this general policy:

"Alcohol and drug abuse are incompatible with military service. Soldiers identified as alcohol and drug abusers who, in the opinion of their commanders warrant retention, will be afforded the opportunity for rehabilitation. Those soldiers identified as alcohol abusers who do not warrant retention will be considered for separation from the military by their unit commander."

ASSIGNMENT TO CRITICAL COMMAND OR SENSITIVE POSITIONS IN THE MILITARY SERVICES

Senior military commanders unanimously state that selection to and assignment in key/sensitive positions, such as positions involving responsibility for nuclear weapons, and responsibility in the chain of command (i.e. squadron or wing commander, ship captain, and company or battalion commander) are so rigorously controlled that any hint of alcohol abuse would result in immediate disqualification or relief from command.

For example, DOD Directive 5210.42 (Personnel Reliability Program) and implementing Service regulations provide for the screening of all personnel selected for or assigned in positions responsible for nuclear weapons. This includes personnel such as:

a. Aircraft and missile crews assigned to systems that deliver nuclear weapons.

b. Command and control personnel in the command or staff line who could direct the disposition and employment of nuclear weapons.

c. Nuclear maintenance personnel.

d. Nuclear storage and supply personnel.

e. Security guards who control access to nuclear weapons facilities and systems.

f. Communications security personnel who receive, maintain, and distribute authenticators and codes.

The DOD Directive sums up the Personnel Reliability Program screening and disposition policy with regard to alcohol abuse as follows:

"Disqualifying. Any of the following traits or conduct shall normally be considered disqualifying. a. Alcohol abuse."

Alcohol abuse is defined in the DOD Directive as: "Any irresponsible use of an alcoholic beverage causing misconduct or unacceptable social behavior, or impairing work performance, physical or mental health, financial responsibility, or personal relationships."

With regard to selection to and assignment in command positions, senior military commanders indicated there is no tolerance for alcohol abuse. Each of the military services views these positions as special positions in the chain of command that must be filled by individuals who are not only professionally peerless but who are in control of their faculties at all times. They further indicated that command jobs at all levels are demanding in this respect; that all who aspire to command know this; and that rotations into and out of these positions recognize the demanding nature of these jobs.

Examples of these kinds of command positions include:

a. Company Commander of an Army rifle company assigned on patrol duty at the DMZ in Korea.

b. Captain of an attack or Trident submarine on patrol.

c. Wing Commander, or even a Squadron Commander, of an Air Force F-111 Tactical Fighter Wing in England.

d. Brigade Commander of the Berlin Brigade.

e. Army M-1 Tank Commander, an E-5, in the 2nd Armored Cavalry Regiment (quick reaction team) on the border in Germany.

f. CINCSAC.

EXAMPLES OF SPECIAL REGULATIONS ON ALCOHOL CONSUMPTION

Article 1150, U.S. Navy Regulations, provides that: "Except as may be authorized by the Secretary of the Navy, the introduction, possession or use of alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes on board any ship, craft, aircraft, or in any vehicle of the Department of the Navy is prohibited."

Air Force Major Air Command instructions that implement Air Force Regulation 60-16 require aircrews to comply with the FAA standard of no more than .04 blood alcohol content for flying. These instructions also prohibit crew personnel, at the minimum, from consuming any alcoholic beverages within 8 hours of a scheduled flying mission.

POLICY ON ENLISTMENT IN THE MILITARY SERVICES

Department of Defense policy is to: "Not induct persons into the Military Services who are alcohol or drug dependent and not hire persons who are alcohol or drug dependent if that dependency impairs job performance." (DOD Directive 1010.4)

This policy is further outlined in the implementing regulations of each of the military services. For example, Army enlistment regulations state that "Applicants having a history, or possible history, of alcoholism, or have been rehabilitated for a period of one year" are disqualified from enlistment in the Army. (Army Regulation 601-210)

This disqualification may be waived for enlistment into the Reserve Forces only, and then only with documentation that an applicant with a history of alcohol abuse has been rehabilitated. Army regulations state: ". . . applicant must have been rehabilitated for a period of 1 year and present documents below to substantiate rehabilitation that has existed for more than a year.

a. Letter from doctor or rehabilitation center.

b. Letter from person's counselor or AA counselor.

c. Letter from another counselor or AA counselor who has knowledge of the person.

d. Letter from current employer, or if unemployed, from most recent employer."

POLICY ON SEPARATION FROM THE MILITARY SERVICES

General Department of Defense policy is to afford alcohol abusers in the Military Services rehabilitation. Therefore, the primary basis for separation is failure to complete a prescribed program of rehabilitation. For example, Army separation regulations state:

"A soldier . . . may be separated because of inability or refusal to participate in, cooperate in, or successfully complete such a [rehabilitation] program. . . ." (Army Regulation 635-200)

However, this does not preclude separation of alcohol abusers without recourse to rehabilitation if in the judgement of a commander retention of the individual is not warranted.

ACTUAL PRACTICE IN MILITARY

Senior military commanders indicate the normal practice in the officer corps, particularly senior officers, with respect to alcohol abuse is to offer the officer the chance to resign. Few are handled via the military justice system.

Officers with known drinking problems are precluded from command assignments and many problems are handled by the selection board process:

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I want to specifically address a section of the summary on page 2 dealing with what actions disqualify an individual from serving in our most critical nuclear and command positions. These points are lifted directly from DOD Directive 521042 which deals with the Personnel Reliability Program—I quote:

Disqualifying. Any of the following traits or conduct shall normally be considered disqualifying. a. Alcohol abuse.

Alcohol abuse is defined in the DOD Directive as:

Any irresponsible use of an alcoholic beverage causing misconduct on unacceptable social behavior, or impairing work performance, physical or mental health, financial responsibility or personal relationships.

I would also like to point out the committee's understanding of the views of our senior military commanders on this point.

Senior military commanders unanimously state that selection to and assignment in key/sensitive positions, such as positions involving responsibility for nuclear weapons, and responsibility in the chain of command (i.e. squadron or wing commander, ship captain, and company or battalion commander) are so rigorously controlled that any hint of alcohol abuse would result in immediate disqualification or relief from command.

Strictly according to the directive, John Tower is disqualified. He was disqualified by the DOD's own directive.

Mr. WALLOP. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALLOP. Those refer to actions on the job, do they not?

Mr. HOLLINGS. I am not going to play the game on the job/off the job.

Mr. WALLOP. It is a simple question.

Mr. HOLLINGS. My colleague and I are going to stay sober here in the Senate Chamber. We stay sober outside the Senate Chamber and around the State of Wyoming.

If the Senator goes around drunk in Wyoming he will not be here again. So, yes, this directive applies not just to "on the job," it requires conducting yourself as an officer and a gentleman. If you are found off base in a bar drunk, or in an airplane drunk, or in a restaurant in Washington drunk, or in New York at a party drunk, and I can go down the list—yes, you would be disqualified.

Mr. WALLOP. But——

Mr. HOLLINGS. It is not just "on the job." Do not raise the canard that we have not seen him drunk on the job.

Mr. WALLOP. Those qualifications of which the Senator speaks are both the judgment of the commander and they are qualifications of people who are on the job. The problem that we are trying to address is to get Senator Tower to the job. There is no indication that he either presently has a problem and, should there be such an indication, the Senator has already foresworn the use of alcohol. So it is not a fair thing to say and not a fair thing for my friend from South Carolina to say that John Tower would be disqualified. He would be if he were on the job and did that, but there is no indication, either that he has ever done it on the job or that he would.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming has a different measure and a double standard. I think "on the job" and "on the base" or "off the base" are one and the same and this directive means exactly that. It says: "Any hint of alcohol abuse." And it means 24 hours a day—on or off the job.

Many of us have been in the military. A soldier does not sit around the barracks getting drunk. He tries to get away from the barracks and back into some civilian lifestyle. But I can tell you this here and now, you cannot require "no hint of alcohol abuse" of the troops in command and then have a different standard for your Secretary of Defense.

Some on the Republican side would like to put us individually on trial. I cannot go along with this notion that as long as you do not get drunk during duty hours, you are a fine candidate for battalion commander, squadron commander, wing commander, or anywhere in the chain of command. That is absurd, because you never know when the alert will come. It can come at midnight as easily as three in the afternoon. And the same policy applies to the seaman in the nuclear submarine service of our nuclear navy.

Mr. WALLOP. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HOLLINGS. I will not yield at this moment.

I notice that the other side has adopted a scorched earth policy. I notice in this morning's news:

Senate Republicans announced yesterday that they will release the names of Democratic opponents of Mr. Tower who have received political contributions, lecture fees, and free trips from defense contractors.

No. 1, Mr. President, that information has already been released. We filed them and they are public knowledge and they have already been published. So it is not a particularly potent threat. But it is very educational for me because I asked my staff: Pull my file and find out what I received from defense contractors by way of contributions, lecture fees, and free trips. And I found out that in 3 years I did not get any free trips. I only got three lecture fees. That is pretty bad for a fellow who supports the Defense Department as strongly as I do.

I go to college campuses addressing different interests. They all oppose each other and cancel each other out. They are so numerous that they could not possibly buy a vote. They do not, of course. But the point is that I learn a lot from going around, and I get fees. But I have not gotten very many from defense. I guess the industry does not realize I am a friend of defense.

Next to Senator INOUYE, I am the ranking member on the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, and I want them to know I studied my humility under Mendel Rivers, of South Carolina. His rule was that if you did not take care of him, he would take care of you.

Mr. President, I had the singular privilege of sailing last month on the U.S.S. Tennessee, a nuclear Trident submarine.

It was the best of Government. I told the crew that I had just left the worst of Government in Washington, and I say that advisedly having been in Government 40 years. We are indulging in an ongoing didly-bop game with the budget deficits, saying we are going to grow out of them. We continuously cut housing, education, research, technical training, and feeding programs for infants. We keep cutting, holding the programs back, and we will not pay the bills for anything up here. It is the worst of Government I have ever seen in 40 years.

But I saw the best of Government on the U.S.S. Tennessee. We went on a dive—overnight—and we witnessed all the different maneuvers. Incidentally, I say to the Senator from Georgia, we closed down the nuclear reactor and started it back up in an hour's time. The Senator from Georgia and I have the Savannah River nuclear plant. They closed it down last year, and we will be lucky if we can get it started this year. But we can do it in the nuclear Navy.

There is discipline in the nuclear Navy. Aboard ship, they kept talking about the PRP. I said, "don't speak to me in an unknown tongue. What is this PRP?" "That, Senator, is the personnel responsibility program whereby we have random testing."

That really got my attention when they said "random testing" because Senator DANFORTH and I will soon reintroduce our bill requiring random testing of workers in public transportation, airlines, trains, buses, and so on.

I asked, "You have random testing?" Absolutely, we have random testing for the critical control positions in the nuclear weapons program. The directive mandating such testing is the one I mentioned previously, DOD Directive 5210.42 dated December 6, 1985.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to print it in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE DIRECTIVE, DECEMBER 6, 1985

Subject: Nuclear Weapon Personnel Reliability Program.

References: (a) DoD Directive 5210.42, "Nuclear Weapon Personnel Reliability Program," April 23, 1981 (hereby canceled)

(b) Title 8, United States Code, Section 1408, June 27, 1952

(c) Title 5, United States Code, Section 522a, Public Law 93-579, "Privacy Act of 1974," December 31, 1974

(d) DoD Directive 5210.41, "Security Criteria and Standards for Protecting Nuclear Weapons," September 12, 1978

A. REISSUANCE AND PURPOSE

This Directive reissues reference (a) to update policy governing the nuclear weapon personnel reliability program (PRP). This program is designed to ensure the highest possible standards of individual reliability in personnel performing duties associated with nuclear weapons and nuclear components.

B. APPLICABILITY AND SCOPE

1. The provisions of this Directive apply to the Office of the Secretary of Defense, the Military Departments, the Organization of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Unified and Specified Commands, and the Defense Agencies that are responsible for operations associated with nuclear weapons (hereafter referred to as "DoD Components").

2. Its provisions apply to all DoD personnel and contractor employees assigned to PRP Critical or Controlled Positions, as defined in enclosure 1.

C. DEFINITIONS.

The terms used in this Directive are defined in enclosure 1.

D. POLICY

1. It is DoD policy to ensure that nuclear weapons are not subject to loss, theft, sabotage, unauthorized use, unauthorized destruction, accidental damage, or jettison. The national security and welfare require, therefore, that only those personnel who have demonstrated unswerving loyalty, integrity, trustworthiness, and discretion of the highest order shall be employed in nuclear weapon PRP positions.

2. PRP is a peacetime program applicable only to personnel who have access to, or control access to, war reserve nuclear weapons, nuclear weapon systems, nuclear components, or sealed authenticators. These personnel perform duties which meet the criteria for critical or controlled positions (see enclosure 1).

a. Therefore, the program does not apply to Reserve and National Guard units not actually possessing war reserve nuclear weapons, nuclear components, or sealed authenticators, nor does it apply to active duty units tasked to receive but not normally possessing war reserve nuclear weapons, nuclear components, or sealed authenticators, or only receiving them at the outbreak of hostilities.

b. Nevertheless, Reserve and National Guard units shall apply PRP standards as feasible, and commanders shall assign only the best and most reliable personnel to billets that would be PRP positions if war reserve nuclear weapons were present. Reserve and National Guard units that do not have personnel performing PRP duties which meet the criteria for critical or controlled positions shall not identify any billets as PRP positions.

3. While adherence to PRP procedures during wartime may be impractical, particularly in a combat theater, the philosophy of the PRP remains in effect. Commanders, while not encumbered with the administrative controls of the peacetime program, must continue to apply their best professional judgment and select only the most trusted individuals to perform nuclear weapon duties.

4. Critical and controlled positions shall be manned only by U.S. citizens or U.S. nationals.

5. Denial and revocation of certification of acceptability for assignment pursuant to this Directive are not punitive, and are not in themselves grounds for disciplinary measures or judicial or nonjudicial punishment. However, such desertification does not bar disciplinary or administration measures otherwise appropriate.

6. Only DoD employees (military or civilian) shall perform the duties of a PRP position, unless the Head of the DoD Component concerned, or a designee, having found this infeasible, has specifically authorized a DoD contractor to do this work.

a. Contractor employees performing services in PRP positions shall meet the reliability standards of this Directive.

b. The requirements set forth in enclosure 2 shall be incorporated into all contracts for such services, and the contractor's security office shall be advised accordingly.

c. Contractor employees shall perform nuclear duties only on those specific United States installations or cleared contractor facilities authorized by the Head of the United States Component, or a designee, for that purpose.

7. Acceptability of personnel for assignment to Critical or Controlled Positions or to training leading to such assignment shall depend on compatibility with national security interests. The reliability standards in this Directive, and the absence of derogatory evidence related to these standards, shall be used to determine acceptability.

8. Enclosure 3 lists typical PRP positions. Because of the diversity of position titles and duties within the Military Departments, the factors set forth in Critical and Controlled Positions (see enclosure 1) shall determine an individual's suitability for a PRP position in a specific unit. All such positions shall be formally designated.

9. Acceptability for assignment, subject to the standards of this Directive, shall be confirmed in writing by a Certifying Official. Before an individual assumes PRP duties, it shall be certified that the individual has: (a) had the required security investigation and clearance; (b) been screened in accordance with the reliability standards of enclosure 4; and (c) been found acceptable and qualified for assignment to a PRP position under the standards described in subsection D.7., above.

10. The PRP Certifying Official shall ensure that all candidates for PRP positions undergo a medical evaluation conducted in accordance with procedures in enclosure 5.

11. The PRP Certifying Official shall personally interview all candidates for PRP positions.

12. The PRP Certifying Official shall cause all personnel assigned to PRP positions to be continually evaluated.

E. RESPONSIBILITIES

1. The Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Policy (DUSD(P)), or designee, shall:

a. Be responsible for overall policy guidance and management oversight of the PRP.

b. Modify or supplement, with the concurrence of the General Counsel, Department of Defense, and the Assistant to the Secretary of Defense (Atomic Energy), any of the enclosures to this Directive after such coordination with the Military Departments and Defense Agencies as may be appropriate.

c. Monitor and evaluate the DoD Components' implementation of the policies enumerated herein.

d. Approve waivers to the policy enunciated herein, on a case-by-case basis, based upon the recommendation of the Head of the responsible DoD Component.

2. The Heads of DoD Components shall effect necessary programing, budgeting, and accounting actions to ensure effective implementation of the PRP.

F. PROCEDURES

1. Detailed procedural requirements pertaining to investigative requirements, medical evaluations, continuing evaluations, certifications, decertifications, and subsequent screening are contained in enclosure 5.

2. Each DoD Component shall establish a procedure for formally designating Certifying Officials and Reviewing Officials under this Directive. The number of such officials shall be kept to the minimum consistent with operational requirements. The position of an individual who is designated as Certifying Official shall be designated as a Critical or Controlled Position commensurate with the highest category of any nuclear duty position in the unit or activity concerned. In nonoperational and support activities, such as staff offices or communications elements controlling or using sealed authenticators, transportation units, or storage maintained depots, the positions of first-level supervisors who have been designated as Certifying Officials shall be similarly designated.

3. Certifying Officials shall identify each PRP position (either Critical or Controlled). The number of such positions shall be restricted to the minimum required to accomplish the mission.

a. Procedures shall be established to ensure that only properly certified personnel are assigned to PRP positions.

b. When PRP positions become vacant, certified personnel shall be assigned as rapidly as possible.

c. Certifying Officials shall reevaluate designated PRP positions at least annually to determine the need for additional positions or the cancellation of unnecessary positions. When specific positions are designated as PRP positions by higher authority, an annual review of those positions by individual units is not required. The higher authority will conduct the annual review for the positions they designate.

d. Procedures shall be established to ensure that at least one of the individuals satisfying the two-man rule has a final PRP certification to preclude simultaneous use of two interim certified individuals.

4. The PRP shall be reviewed and evaluated during appropriate inspections and staff visits by all levels of command. The inspection shall include all aspects of the program as established by this Directive. The results of these inspections shall be reviewed periodically at the highest level within the DoD Component to ensure effective and consistent application.

G. REPORTING REQUIREMENTS

1. An annual status reflecting permanent decertifications from the PRP shall be forwarded to the DUSD(P), ATTN: Director, Security Plans and Programs, by February 15 each year. Detailed instructions for preparation of the report are contained in enclosure 6.

2. The reporting requirements in G.1. have been assigned Report Control Symbol DD-POL(A)1403 (formerly DD-COMP(A)1403).

H. EFFECTIVE DATE AND IMPLEMENTATION

This Directive is effective immediately. Forward one copy of implementing documents to the Deputy Under Secretary of Defense for Policy within 120 days. The copy shall be marked to identify the corresponding paragraphs of this Directive. Forward one copy of changes to implementing instructions within 60 days of publication.

WILLIAM H. TAFT IV,
Deputy Secretary of Defense.

DEFINITIONS

For purposes of this Directive the following definitions apply:

1. Access. Proximity to a nuclear weapon or nuclear component affording an opportunity to tamper with or damage a nuclear weapon when such activities could go undetected. Normally, a person near a weapon would not be considered to have access if an escort or guard were provided for either the person or the weapon.

2. Alcohol Abuse. Any irresponsible use of an alcoholic beverage causing misconduct or unacceptable social behavior, or impairing work performance, physical or mental health, financial responsibility, or personal relationships.

3. Armed. Equipped with a firearm along with appropriate ammunition.

4. Certifying Official. For military and DoD civilian personnel, the commander, or designee, responsible for the operation or security, or both, of nuclear weapons, in a PRP position allowing sufficient personal contact with all personnel to permit continual evaluation. For DoD contractor personnel, the DoD official designated in the contract.

5. Competent Medical Authority. A U.S. military medical officer or a U.S. civilian physician employed by the U.S. Government, responsible for providing medical service or clinical evaluations as specified by the Certifying Official and, when appropriate, the Reviewing Official.

6. Controlled Position. A position whose incumbent, because of assigned nuclear duties:

a. Has access but not technical knowledge, as defined herein; or

b. Controls entry into an Exclusion Area, but does not have access or technical knowledge, as defined herein; or

c. Is armed, assigned duties relating to nuclear security, and in a direct line of sight to a nuclear weapon and could inflict damage upon the weapon or, when joined, to its delivery system; or

d. Has been designated as a Certifying Official at operational unit level or first level Certifying Official in staff activities with identified PRP positions at the Controlled level only.

7. Critical Position. A position whose incumbent, because of assigned nuclear duties:

a. Has access and technical knowledge as defined herein; or

b. Can, at battalion, squadron, ship level, or below, either directly or indirectly cause the launch or use of a nuclear weapon; or

c. Controls or uses sealed authenticators, permissive action link (PAL) materials, related codes, strategic missile computer tapes, emergency action messages, or release procedures for nuclear weapons; or

d. Has been designated as a Certifying Official at operational unit level or first level Certifying Official in staff activities with identified Critical PRP positions.

8. DoD Personnel. Active duty military personnel, active civil service employees of the Department of Defense, or DoD contractors and their employees.

9. Drug Abuse. The illegal, wrongful, or improper use of any narcotic substance, cannabis, or other controlled substance or the illegal or wrongful possession, transfer, or sale of same.

10. Exclusion Area. A designated area immediately surrounding any nuclear weapon. Normally its boundaries are the walls, floor, and ceiling of a structure, or are delineated by a permanent or temporary barrier. In the absence of positive preventive measures, access into the Exclusion Area constitutes access to the nuclear weapon.

11. Limited Area. A designated area immediately surrounding one or more Exclusion Areas. Normally this is the area between the boundaries of Exclusion Areas and the outer or inner barrier or boundary of the perimeter security system.

12. Reviewing Official. The commander or a designated representative at the command level immediately above that of the Certifying Official, who is responsible for operations involving nuclear weapons.

13. Tamper. To perform intentionally an incorrect or unauthorized act that could cause prearming, arming, launching, firing, releasing, or detonation of a nuclear weapon or degradation of weapon performance.

14. Technical Knowledge. Knowledge, however obtained, that would allow an individual to tamper with a nuclear weapon or nuclear component in a manner that such tampering would not be detected during normal prefire operations or weapon-monitoring inspections and could cause, then or later, unauthorized prearming, arming, launching, firing, releasing, or detonation of a nuclear weapon or degradation of weapon performance.

15. U.S. National. A citizen of the United States or a person who, though not a U.S. citizen, owes permanent allegiance to the United States. Title 8 U.S.C. 1408 (reference (b)) provides detailed information as to identification of noncitizen U.S. nationals.

CONTRACTOR REQUIREMENTS

The contract shall require that contractor employees performing duties in PRP positions under this Directive shall meet the reliability standards of the PRP. The contractor shall:

1. Instruct managerial, supervisory, medical, and other personnel in the purpose, standards, and procedures of the PRP.

2. Inform and instruct each employee about to work in a PRP position, that the assignment is subject to the standards and procedures of the PRP.

3. Ensure that employees assigned or to be assigned to a PRP position undergo medical examination and evaluation.

4. Provide the Certifying Official with results of a medical evaluation of any contractor employee assigned or to be assigned to a PRP position, and immediately report any other information about such employee, relevant to the standards for assignment under the PRP.

5. Provide for sufficient observation by contractor supervisory personnel of employees assigned to PRP positions, except when such employees are assigned to a DoD Component under the direct supervision of DoD personnel in which case the Certifying Official will be responsible for such observation.

6. Assign to the duties of a PRP position only those employees eligible, according to the Certifying Official, under the standards of the PRP.

7. Temporarily remove an employee from a PRP position immediately upon receipt of information that is, or appears to be, reason for decertification from such assignment under the standards of the PRP.

8. Notify the Certifying Official immediately of such temporary removal and the reasons for it.

9. Notify appropriate activities so that entry authority and access lists may be updated to bar decertified personnel.

10. Immediately remove an employee from a PRP position upon notification by the Certifying Official that the employee has been temporarily decertified.

11. Reassign the employee when notified by the Reviewing Official that the employee has indeed failed to meet reliability standards, and has been permanently decertified.

12. Provide to the Defense Industrial Security Clearance Office (DISCO), Columbus, Ohio 43216, a list of all contractor employees assigned to PRP positions. Update lists as warranted. The lists shall include full name and social security account number, plus name and address of the employing contractor facility and the name, address, and autovon telephone number of the Certifying Official.

PRP PROCEDURES

A. INITIAL SCREENING

Determination of initial acceptability for assignments under the PRP shall be made by the Certifying Official on the basis of the following:

1. Security investigation and security clearance

a. Critical Position: A current background investigation (BI) (see paragraph 1.c., below) and a current security clearance at a level commensurate with the security classification of information required in the position.

(1) If appropriate, review of the results of the BI by the Certifying Official. No such review is required if the agency that conducted the investigation and the central adjudicating activity have discovered neither derogatory nor potentially disqualifying information.

(2) In the event that it becomes necessary to consider an individual for a Critical Position and the required BI has not been completed, interim certification may be made under carefully controlled conditions, as set forth below:

(a) The individual has had a favorable national agency check (NAC) within the past 5 years without a break in active service or employment longer than 1 year; or has had a favorable BI for more than 5 years, and has not had a break in active service or employment longer than 1 year. For purposes of this Directive, service as a cadet at any of the four service academies may be considered "active service."

(b) The BI has been requested.

(c) All other requirements of the PRP screening process have been fulfilled.

(d) The individual is identified to supervisory personnel, entry controllers who directly control access to exclusion areas, and others as necessary, as having interim certification.

(e) The individual is not paired, in a two-man team, with anyone having only an interim certification.

(f) Justification of the need for interim certification is documented by the Certifying Official.

(g) Should the BI not be completed within 150 days of the date requested, the Certifying Official, through the appropriate clearance authority, shall ascertain from the Defense Investigative Service the reason for delay in completion. The Certifying Official shall then determine whether to continue or withdraw the interim certification.

b. Controlled Position: A current NAC, see paragraph A.1.c., below, and a current security clearance at a level commensurate with the security classification of information required in the postion.

(1) An NAC completed for the purpose of first-term enlistment or induction into the Armed Forces satisfies this requirement.

(2) Interim certification is authorized for an individual who does not meet the requirement of a current NAC, that is, completed within the past 5 years, subject to the following conditions:

(a) The individual's favorable NAC or higher investigation is more than 5 years old, and no break in active service or employment has exceeded 1 year. For purposes of this Directive, service as a cadet at any of the four service academies may be considered "active service."

(b) A new NAC has been requested.

(c) All other requirements of the PRP screening process have been fulfilled.

(d) Should the NAC not be completed within 90 days of the date requested, the procedure set forth in subparagraph A.1.a.(2)(g), above, for ascertaining the status of the BI in the case of a Critical Position shall apply.

(e) The individual is identified to supervisory personnel, entry controllers who directly control access to exclusion areas, and others as necessary, as having interim certification.

(f) The individual is not used to fulfill the two-man rule requirement with a partner also having interim certification.

c. Fulfilling Investigative Requirements: The investigative requirements in paragraphs A.1.a. and b., above, shall have been met when:

(1) The investigation upon which certification depends was completed within 5 years of the date of initial assignment to a PRP position, and no break in active service or employment longer than 1 year occurred between completion of the investigation and initial assignment.

(2) In cases where the investigation ended more than 5 years before initial assignment or where a break in active service or employment exceeded 1 year after completion of the investigation, a new investigation is required.

(3) After initial assignment to the PRP, a new investigation is not required so long as the individual remains in the PRP. Additional investigative requirements are outlined in subsection F.2., below.

(4) The word "NAC," when used in this Directive, includes the ENTNAC for first-term enlistees and the NACI conducted for civilian employment.

2. Medical evaluation

a. As part of the required screening process, medical histories and records, if they are sufficiently comprehensive and current for the purpose, shall be evaluated to determine the candidate's physical and mental condition and qualifications under the standards of the PRP.

(1) Screening of medical records must be performed by competent medical authority (see definition, enclosure 1) or other personnel specifially trained and designated to perfrom this function. When review is accomplished by other than competent medical authority, as defined, and such review raises a question of an individual's physical or mental suitability for assignment to a PRP position, the case will be referred to competent medical authority for evaluation or additional medical examination.

(2) If available medical records are inadequate, competent medical authority shall conduct a medical examination to determine medical qualification under PRP standards. This medical evaluation shall include psychiatric aspects of the case, involving psychiatric consultation when indicated.

b. Competent medical authority shall advise the Certifying Official and, when appropriate, the Reviewing Official, on all aspects of any condition that may reflect on an individual's suitability for assignment to a PRP position. The Certifying Official shall also be advised of any prescribed medication that could detract from the ability of an individual in the PRP to perform assigned duties.

(1) Nonmedical Certifying and Reviewing Officals are authorized to review medical records of candidates and members of the PRP to make determinations required by this Directive. Due to the sensitive and confidential nature of the records, review authority shall extend only to the designated Certifying and Reviewing Officials and not to their representatives. When approprate, such review shall proceed with the assistance of a physician who can advise on medical record data which might otherwise be misinterpreted.

(2) In connection with review of medical records, pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 552a(b)(1) (reference (c)), such medical records may be disclosed to Certifying and Reviewing Officials for the stated purpose without either a request from, or the consent of, the individuals to whom the records pertain. Certifying and Reviewing Officials may not release or discuss the content of medical records except as provided in subparagraph A.2.b.(1), above.

c. When non-U.S. physicians provide routine medical support responsible U.S. medical personnel shall ensure that medical information relating to personnel in the PRP is properly reported to the Certifying Official.

d. Individuals in the PRP who require medical treatment by non-DoD medical personnel shall be instructed to notify the Certifying Official of such treatment.

e. The Secretaries of the Military Departments shall ensure that physicians on duty with the Armed Forces have been instructed in the purpose of the PRP and have been advised of their responsibilities thereunder.

3. Personnel Files: The individual's personnel file and other official records and information locally available concerning behavior or conduct that could be relevant to PRP standards shall be reviewed in detail.

4. Personal Interview: A personal interview shall inform the individual of the significance of the assignment, the reliability standards, and the need for reliable performance, and shall ascertain the individual's attitude toward the PRP.

5. Proficiency Qualification: It shall be certified, in accordance with DOD Directive 5210.41 (reference (d)), that the individual has had the formal course of instruction and/or experience applicable to a particular Critical or Controlled Position, and is proficient in the duties to be performed.

B. CERTIFICATION

The Certifying Official shall confirm an individual's acceptability for assignment, subject to the standards of this Directive, before that individual begins performing PRP duties. Certification shall be properly recorded.

C. CONTINUING EVALUATION

Certifying Officials shall cause continuing evaluation of the reliability of all personnel whose acceptability for assignment is subject to the standards of this Directive, and shall take action necessary to endure that:

1. Personnel and medical records, including dental records, reflect assignment of an individual to a PRP position or to training leading to such assignment.

2. Individuals whose assignment is subject to the standards of this Directive are so identified to managers, supervisors, and other concerned line and staff officials; and that any information that raises questions about such individuals; judgment or reliability is reported and acted upon without delay.

3. Individuals whose performance of duty may be impaired by the use of prescribed medication or short-term stress, as determined by competent medical authority or dental authority when dental treatment is involved, shall be restricted from duty involving nuclear weapons for the period of the stress or use of medication but should not be removed from the PRP under section D., below, of this enclosure, unless the condition is diagnosed to be of a long-term or permanent nature, or unless otherwise appropriate.

4. Individuals within the PRP understand their obligation to report any factors or conditions that could adversely affect their performance within the PRP to their Certifying Officials.

5. Contractor employees who have been determined eligible and have been assigned to PRP positions are identified to the Defense Industrial Security Clearance Office (DISCO), Columbus, Ohio 43216. DISCO, upon receipt of any information that may bear on the continued assignment of such an employee under the PRP, shall forward that information to the appropriate certifying Official.

D. DECERTIFICATION

Any individual who fails to meet the reliability standards specified in this Directive shall not be assigned to, or continued in, duties of a PRP position. Temporary or permanent decertification shall depend on the circumstances, character, and transitory or continuing nature of the cause.

1. General: A certification of acceptability shall be revoked immediately upon a Certifying Official's determination that an individual no longer meets the standards contained in this Directive. The certification shall terminate administratively when an individual transfers from a PRP position to one not requiring certification.

2. Temporary Decertification: Temporary removal from PRP duties shall occur immediately upon receipt of information that is, or appears, reason for decertification from the PRP.

a. Except when restricted from PRP duties as required by section C., above, individuals removed temporarily shall be notified in writing by the Certifying Official of such action (and cause) within 15 workdays, unless returned earlier to regular duties.

b. The Certifying Official shall expeditiously collect information essential to a considered decision about voiding the temporary decertification or invoking a permanent decertification. In the event of suspected alcohol or drug abuse, such information should include a medical evaluation by competent medical authority.

c. Normally, personnel shall not be permanently reassigned until a final decision is reached by the Certifying Official and, if necessary, the Reviewing Official.

3. Permanent Decertification: This is a determination by the Certifying Official that the individual does not meet the reliability standards specified in this Directive. In such cases the Reviewing Official shall advise the individual in writing of the determination and reasons for it, and of the requirement for review by the reviewing official.

E. REVIEW OF PERMANENT DECERTIFICATION

1. To ensure uniform application of the reliability standards specified by this Directive and effective utilization of personnel, consistent with the purpose of the PRP, the Reviewing Official shall review each case involving a negative determination.

2. Upon review of the Certifying Official's determination, the Reviewing Official shall send written notification to the individual and the activity where assigned, of the findings and conclusion. The Reviewing Official may seek additional clarification or extenuating information from the individual concerned, when such action seems warranted. (In the case of a DoD contractor employee, the contractor shall be told only that the employee has been decertified and must therefore be reassigned to non-PRP duties in compliance with contractual requirements.)

3. If the Reviewing Official sustains permanent decertification, appropriate entries shall be made in the individual's personnel record.

4. In instances involving approval of permanent decertification, the individual shall be reassigned to a position not requiring PRP certification.

F. SUBSEQUENT SCREENING

Whenever an individual who is currently PRP certified is transferred to another PRP billet with a new certifying official he or she must be interviewed by the new Certifying Official. A rescreening of medical and personnel records must also occur whenever those records are moved to a new organization or location in conjunction with the transfer above. Such rescreening ensured the new Certifying Official has current information for the interview, and should strengthen relations among the Certifying Official, medical officials, and personnel specialists by increasing their interaction. The depth of the interview will be determined by the new commander and/or the Certifying Official.

1. When an individual is moving from one PRP position to another, records of the prior certifications are to be favorably weighed in accepting the individual for the new assignment. An individual being screened for reassignment from a Controlled Position to a Critical Position, may be certified on an interim basis with a NAC only without a need for the NAC to have been completed within the past 5 years as required by subparagraph A.1.a.(2)(a), above.

2. A new investigation is required in accordance with paragraph A.1.a. or b., above, under the following conditions:

a. Assignment to a non-PRP position intervened for more than 5 years, with no investigation equivalent to, or more extensive than, that required for the PRP position for which the individual is being considered; or

b. A break in active service or government employment exceeded 1 year; or

c. Significant derogatory or questionable information materializes, rendering this action necessary.

3. No new investigation or certification is required for those individuals now in PRP positions.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR PREPARATION OF ANNUAL STATUS REPORTS REFLECTING PERMANENT DECERTIFICATION FROM THE PRP

Each report shall be designated "For Official Use Only" and include, for the preceding year ending December 31, the following information by class of personnel, such as, military, federal civilian, and defense contractor, in accordance with the attached format. (Note: Each class of personnel; military, civilian, or contractor is reported on a separate form.)

1. Number of personnel in Critical and Controlled Positions, by area, on December 31.

2. Number of decertifications in Critical and Controlled Positions by area.

3. Number of personnel permanently decertified from the PRP subsequent to certification, categorized by prinicipal disqualification trait or conduct set forth in paragraphs 2.a. through f., enclosure 4, above. Indicate no more than one disqualification trait or conduct per individual.

4. Data submitted for subsection C.2. of attachment 1, below, should be categorized further by type of principal drug involved.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Without going to the full text because my colleague from Ohio went into this last evening, I cite page 4-1, "Disqualifying Reliability Standards." This was identified in the summary I mentioned previously.

Paragraph 2 is on disqualifying. It reads: "Any of the following traits or conduct should nominally be considered disqualifying. a. Alcohol abuse."

If you do not come to the conclusion after reading the FBI reports that there has been alcohol abuse by Senator Tower, then I submit that you need remedial reading because the facts are just too many.

Frankly, I originally had a skeptical view of the various allegations about Senator Tower. I recalled the case of former Senator Talmadge some years ago. I voted with him. I well recall the domestic difficulties that gave rise to some of those charges. I thought that that might be occurring with Senator Tower, who I was initially prepared to vote for. The FBI reports persuaded me otherwise.

When I call on the President of the United States to release the record, he can easily protect the confidentiality of the individuals. That is the only duty he owes. If the FBI says, "I take this statement from you confidentially. Senator Tower is up for the appointment of Secretary of Defense, but I would like you to tell me about him, is he a loyal citizen," and so on.

Over the years, I have seen many, many FBI reports and, incidentally, I investigated the FBI in 1954 as a member of a Hoover Commission task force looking into our intelligence activities.

I can tell you there is nothing confidential other than the names of the individuals interviewed, and we can strike those names from the report. We can mask the names, and get down to facts, get away from this diversionary game of impugning Senators' motives. Mr. Tower's defenders have ambushed Democrats with the charge of partisanship, ambushed Senator NUNN with charges of a power play, and so on.

I have the greatest admiration for Senator MITCHELL for not getting sucked into that partisan tit for tat. Rather than jumping up and down every time Senator DOLE had a new charge, Senator MITCHELL did not respond. I was home at the time and I turned to my wife and said, "Well thank heaven GEORGE is not reacting to everything like that because it would look partisan." There is not any question about the partisan nature of the other side's assault on this body. This is character assassination—assassination of the character of the U.S. Senate.

There is also assassination of an individual Senator's character. I cite an editorial in the Greenville News on March 2. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Greenville News, Mar. 2, 1989]

HOLLINGS TAKES SIDES WITH PRIVATE ACCUSERS

South Carolina Sen. Fritz Hollings has helped put the troubled Cabinet nomination of John Tower in perspective. There's a political lynching going on; and Hollings has joined the mob.

Hollings and Tower served together in the U.S. Senate for 18 years, from 1966 through 1984. And during that period Hollings undoubtedly observed enough firsthand, and heard enough second hand, to establish an informed opinion of Tower's character and patterns of conduct.

Just so, and on the basis of that personal knowledge and assessment of other people's impressions, Hollings said he planned until very recently to vote to confirm Tower as secretary of defense.

Meanwhile, though, tales surfaced of Tower being indiscretely fond of women and alcohol. Tales indeed: These were anonymous accusations for which no one would step forward and vouch for their authenticity. Yet, astonishingly members of the Senate committee screening the Tower nomination repeated the tales as troubling generalizations, giving them the stature of legitimate charges.

It is against this background that Sen. Hollings now says he has read the report of the FBI investigation into the tales; and though no one yet will step forward as a public accuser of John Tower, Hollings says the report makes a persuasive showing that the accusers are credible, their accusations are convincing, and his opposition to Tower is thus unavoidable.

And to top off that deviation from logic and fairness, Hollings says the evidential basis for rejecting Tower is "overwhelming, it is not even close." He means that the 55 Senate Democrats wired for a party-line vote against Tower represent his sense of 100 percent thoughtfulness.

This doesn't even reach the subtlety level demonstrated by Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts. Kennedy voted against Tower in the Senate Armed Services Committee, making it an 11-9 vote for rejection instead of a 10-10 vote to report the nomination to the full Senate without recommendation.

At least Kennedy, who has some expertise in womanizing and drinking, resorted to entirely different grounds to oppose Tower. Happily for mobs, lynchings devoted to striking down the subjects of their inflamed feelings don't require any other consistency of purpose.

Sen. Hollings places uncommon confidence in accusations made against Tower by persons Tower is not allowed to publicly confront. And Hollings shows no deference to President Bush who publicly accepts responsibility for his choice of Tower. Our senator's reasoning in all this is unclear, but he certainly isn't driven by any impulse to be fair, or by any desire to cooperate with a new president overwhelmingly supported by South Carolina voters in the recent election.

Mr. HOLLINGS. The sloppiness of the thinking and writing in this editorial are matched only by the inaccuracy of its facts. The editorial says "no one yet will step forward as a public accuser of John Tower," false. We have talked about Weyrich, Adelman, and others, all of them pillars of the new right. These people are perhaps Mr. Tower's most damning accusers. The Greenville News editorial poses as an attack dog for fairness, but in truth it is a partisan poodle echoing the most hackneyed lines of Senator Tower's defenders. The editorial cites "anonymous accusations for which no one would step forward and vouch for their authenticity." False; false. The News takes its cue from the President of the United States because I have heard him say the same things.

I tell the President and I tell my distinguished colleague from Alaska that the key charges are credible and corroborated. They say Senator Tower is not allowed to confront the charges. On the contrary, the report's charges have been presented to Senator Tower. He has given ample opportunity to rebut the charges in the FBI reports.

Mr. WALLOP. Will the Senator yield for one question?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes.

Mr. WALLOP. Are you contending that Senator Tower is permitted to see this FBI report?

Mr. HOLLINGS. It is my understanding that he has had the offer to rebut its charges.

Mr. WALLOP. I beg to differ.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I believe you should ask the White House.

Mr. WALLOP. He is not permitted to see that report, and that is one of the fundamental unfairnesses of this process.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Let us clear that for the public. They see witness X who makes a statement and—of course, they mask the identity of the interviewee—then they go to Senator Tower: "Witness X said that on such and such a date you were here," and Senator Tower said, "I wasn't even in the country on that date."

Mr. WALLOP. I beg to differ with my friend. It is absolutely incorrect what you are saying.

Mr. HOLLINGS. It is absolutely incorrect what you are saying because I have just stated the truth. I have seen that.

Mr. WALLOP. The Senator has his version of the truth which is not available to Senator Tower.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Senator Tower is given the facts and charges in the report.

Mr. WALLOP. No, sir, Senator Tower is not allowed to see the report, in whole or in part.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I have seen individual refutations, and that is what I wanted to see. I wanted to look at that credibility and measure it for my own conscience.

Mr. WALLOP. I just cannot let it go, Senator. The FBI does not tell Senator Tower the name or the source of those allegations.

Mr. HOLLINGS. I did not say they tell the name of the accuser. The name is masked to preserve confidentiality. Indeed, a number of charges were refuted by Mr. Tower.

Mr. President, I return to the charge that Senator Tower is being treated unfairly. There is a simple solution here. Let the President make the FBI reports public. In this particular case I think it would serve a worthy purpose once the names are masked and other precautions are taken, to open the FBI reports to the public. Give it to Senator Tower. That is what I have requested and that is what I plead. But that is a decision for President Bush. Let me note, however, that I have been told reliably that Senator Tower objects to making the reports public. So ask him. Let the record be made public. This would do me a favor, do him a favor, and do the truth a favor. Does he want it released?

So let us get down to the nitty-gritty of where we are on this question of alcohol abuse.

I took the liberty of checking with the Pentagon and I am saying to myself, "Wait a minute now, you are going to put your friend in as Secretary of Defense when you know what the DOD has done with alcohol cases in the last few years."

From 1984 to 1988, there were 13,515 enlisted personnel discharged for alcohol abuse by the DOD. The DOD admits to only five officers. But, the DOD report containing these figures states that officers are not usually charged with alcohol abuse but with general misconduct or miscellaneous provisions, when he is separated from the service. But we know of actually 5 officers and 13,515 enlisted. The DOD says this is the bottom line, 13,520, but there were many many more discharges due to alcohol abuse. They just weren't all called that. There were also a sizable number of decertifications due to alcohol abuse in the PRP Program—that is the program controlled by DOD directive 5210.42, that deals with nuclear officers and other critical personnel. In 1987, there were 415 of them. So this is my test. How do you swear in as Secretary of Defense, an individual who must deal with thousands of alcohol abuse cases, when he is a known alcoholic abuser himself. Man, what are we talking about in this body? What are we debating? This is an open-and-shut case. The man has a problem, let him handle the problem. But do not ask us to jeopardize the discipline, do not let us make a mockery of the directive of the Navy, Army, Air Force, Marines, the entire military, and civilians. The entire discipline of our armed services depends upon this. And here we dare to quibble, "Was he on duty?" "Did you see him on the floor?" And all of these other things.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question about those case?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Yes.

Mr. WALLOP. Is there one of those cases that does not also involve either a criminal violation or a duty standard violation?

Mr. HOLLINGS. Alcohol was enough for me. I did not go further. My answer is I did not determine whether or not there was criminal violations.

Mr. WALLOP. That is one of the problems.

Mr. HOLLINGS. It is not a problem for me. I said it is a problem for the Senator. You want him drunk and criminal. All I have to do is find him drunk.

Now, Mr. President, with respect to the test and some of the comments made, what are the nominees' rights. I wish the Senator from Alaska could have stayed and I would be glad to rejoin this issue with him at any time. What are the rights of the nominee, my distinguished friend calls out, under the Constitution? N-o-n-e, none. Because under the Constitution I could come in here and say I do not like him. I do not have to give any reason. I do not have even to say I do not like him. I can just stand silent and vote against him. That is a valid ballot cast in the advise and consent procedure under the Constitution. So there you are.

Now, we all know as a practical matter that it does not work that way. We all have to always answer to our constituents, and so we lean backward and forward to be fair and scrupulous, and the only reason I am on the floor is to persuade my constituents that, by gosh, we did not casually, as charged in the editorial, come forward in a conspiracy or partisan attack, with no evidence, and all those other ignorant charges. We have applied the same test that we have given all other potential Secretaries of Defense. This is the only Secretary of Defense in this, my 23d year, where even the subject has been raised. Charges have been raised publicly, privately, by way of the FBI report and everything else of that kind.

More typical are the nominations of Mr. Skinner and Mr. Mosbacher. We did not have the controversies. I found them very intelligent, very skilled, outstanding gentlemen with tremendous civic records and proud appointments and I join in President Bush's pride. What a contrast to the debate on Senator Tower where the nominee's defenders resort to splitting hairs and drawing little lines on a base and off base, on duty and off duty or whether the drunkenness was in conjunction with a criminal act. And I do not think it is wise to make the issue one of whether or not actual laws were broken. The DOD directive wisely says, simply, any hint. I mean to emphasize those words.

Mr. WALLOP. But will the Senator yield again for one last question. I regret doing this but I think it is important. The public is watching. The regulation the Senator cited concerning the standard for these people being dismissed, or the numbers of which the Senator also cited to us and if the Senator will read the rest of the story—involvement in criminal acts or dereliction of duty.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Not so for the nuclear Navy. Alcohol is enough. I am absolutely proof positive, confident on that. And I am reading this Department of Defense Policy on Alcohol Abuse and not crime. We put it in the record. It is in there. "Any of the following traits or conduct shall normally be considered disqualifying: (a) alcohol abuse." Alcohol abuse is defined as "any irresponsible use of an alcoholic beverage causing misconduct or unacceptable social behavior or impairing work performance, physical or mental health, financial responsibility or personal relationships." It does not say crime. I do not see crime in there?

Mr. WALLOP. It does.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Where I am reading it on page 2 of the summary I mentioned.

Mr. WALLOP. I have it. Misconduct is criminal behavior, unacceptable social behavior.

Mr. HOLLINGS. Misconduct is criminal behavior. I am talking about the definition of alcohol abuse on page 2 of the summary. Let us not try to make a criminal out of John Tower.

Mr. WALLOP. I have the same regulation. I am saying any irresponsible use of an alcoholic beverage causing misconduct, criminal behavior.

Mr. HOLLINGS. That is in further elaboration. I have read the actual definition from the DOD Directive on the Personnel Reliability Program that involves alcohol abuse.

I have the entire thing in the record so we have every page in here. It refers to the part I read at the very beginning where they would be immediately disqualified, and on that basis Senator Tower is, rather than confirmed, he is immediately disqualified under his own directive if he were there.

If we had already confirmed Senator Tower and we read the FBI reports, we would all have to huddle in the Armed Services and Defense Appropriations debating how in the world we can disqualify, court-martial, or dismiss from the service thousands of people for alcohol abuse last year, when we look at the record here of the Secretary of Defense? How could the DOD function with such a double standard.

From page 2 of the summary I will read one more time. "Disqualifying: Any of the following traits or conduct shall normally be considered disqualifying, A, alcohol abuse." Alcohol abuse is defined in the DOD directive as "Any irresponsible use of an alcoholic beverage causing misconduct or unacceptable social behavior or impairing work performance, physical or mental health, financial responsibility, or personal relationships."

That is their definition. So we get right to the answer of a previous question by my distinguished colleague from Wyoming where he said it did not impair Senator Tower's work. If you did not see him on the job, if you did not see him drunk, if you did not catch him drunk on the job, the inference being of course that as long as he stays sober at work, it's OK to get drunk and disorderly anywhere and any time you please. Not so. The DOD directive says "unacceptable social behavior." They are certainly not referring to on-the-job behavior. It is all "yes, sir" and "no, sir" as I remember it. The directive did not just say "work performance." It said "social behavior." And it means 24 hours a day.

I want to yield to others. I will be through shortly. But we are not here on trial ourselves, although I will be glad to answer any questions about our alleged unfairness. I will be glad to answer any of these spurious charges. They call that the octopus defense, where they squirt the dark confusion onto the debate such as honoraria and defense trips.

There has been a question in this Senator's mind, substantiated by a record made in the House side, regarding the degree of security that was maintained in Geneva. I am confident from the report that security was violated, and I am confident that Senator Tower was one of several officials responsible for security in Geneva. But I have not gone into that. We can go into that if you all want to really let it all hang out. But this is a personal thing, and there is no personal assassination. The President can run around hollering "no evidence, innuendo, rumor, just partisan politics." He is totally off base. He is hearing here from a Senator that has stuck with him on Bob Bork for the Supreme Court. I did that not on account of partisanship but because I think he is one of the most distinguished jurists ever produced by this country. I will stand by my vote. So I vote them as I see them. I try to study them closely.

I have reached the age to be very, very careful about personal matters.

Senator Tower is—in a sense—asking for a promotion. We want to know here how he deals with an officer and a gentleman. He will be the Secretary of officers and gentlemen and of enlisted personnel—all conducting their behavior in accordance with the Secretary's directive on alcohol abuse. You cannot tell the 2.1 million people in the armed forces, "We are going to give you a test on alcohol abuse but not give such tests to the civilian leaders."

The Senators say, "We don't care about that. We are Senators, and we think he is a pretty good example. We ought to make him Secretary in a hurry because he can do a good job." Those who know Senator Tower, like myself, feel that he could do a good job.

That is not the test, that he could do a good job. The example that he sets as Secretary is equally as important as his doing a good job.

The Senator from Georgia and the membership have been indulgent of me for the moment. Once again, I did not want to try this case. I would be delighted to, if they want to get into this partisanship scrap all weekend about how we are trying to make a power grab, and everything else of the kind.

The Department of Defense is a mess and it needs leadership now. There are too many personnel in the DOD. We should be withdrawing troops from Europe. We will be withdrawing troops from Korea. President Bush says they will remain as long as they are needed, there is a good case to be made, yes, that our Air Force in Korea is needed. But the Army's Second Division including certainly the downtown Seoul golf course and base ought to be given back to the South Koreans, in this Senator's opinion. And, in an expeditious manner.

We can get into all of these things, contracting and the contracting out problem. We heard from Senator Goldwater—a good friend. He has had a lot of good, cute, colorful quotes to the effect that we could not get a government together if we tested everyone for alcohol. But this is no occasion for flippancy. We have to clean up the DOD. We have a real tough job to do. We need someone who has not already been voted down by a majority of the Armed Services Committee.

Similarly, with all the defense journals, Army, Air Force, and Navy Times, and Defense News saying move on, Mr. Tower, let the President appoint someone else. There is no reason for this long debate because the record is clear. It is convincing. It is credible. It is corroborated.

I repeat my bet, as I take my seat, 10 to 1 are the odds. I will show 10 events during 1988. I did not worry about 1987, or that report in yesterday's Post. I wanted to find out whether there had been a recovery because we all believe in forget and forgive. But this is not the time for forgiveness. This is a time to measure the record as it appears on top of the table. I wish the President of the United States would put it on top of the table and quit playing this game, quit talking about innuendo and rumor and saying "totally gunned down," because he is absolutely wrong.

I yield the floor.

Mr. LOTT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHELBY). The Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. President, I rise in support of the nomination of John Tower as Secretary of Defense, and I have several thoughts I do want to give here this afternoon. But before we begin that, I will yield to the Senator from South Dakota, who has an airplane he would like to catch. I will yield for 2 or 3 minutes, as he would see fit, for those comments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I am going to the Air Force Academy this weekend as a member of its Board of Visitors, and I must catch a plane.

Mr. President, I remain undecided on the nomination of John Tower. But I do feel he was treated very shabbily in the Washington Post yesterday. I have visited the FBI records room each day for the last 3 days. I have pretty much taken at face-value the FBI report. But I think we need more analysis of how accurate these reports are. Perhaps they could be made public with the names expunged.

Maybe we could get an analysis or review of each allegation.

Mr. President, let me also say that I will not base my decision on these personal matters. I had hoped we could have a serious debate on substantive defense issues such as the defense contractor reform problem. This is the area of primary concern to me—not all this hearsay gossip on personal matters.

Also, normally, such debate includes issues such as the nominee's positions on our troop strength in Europe, strategic planning, and so forth.

Mr. President, I did want to express my concern about the accuracy of many allegations in the FBI report and the Washington Post yesterday. Too much attention is directed to these matters, and I agree with the President that perhaps an unfair standard is being applied in this respect.

My concerns about Senator Tower arise from a philosophy I have about what the Secretary of Defense should be vis-a-vis the contractor community. Last November, long before Senator Tower was nominated, I wrote President-elect Bush a letter urging that a Secretary of Defense be appointed who was separate from the normal military-industrial complex.

A B-1B bomber crashed recently near Rapid City, SD. Some in our civilian population, and some in our military population, believe that the electronics system in the B-1B has defective parts. Experts say it may cost $10 billion to fix up the B-1B. I believe the contractors should pay to fix it—not the taxpayers.

The $500 hammer, the $300 coffeemaker, and so forth—we must end these abuses.

One way is to demand reform in the defense contracting system, and to use this confirmation process to do so. This is my primary concern.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. President, I proceed here with some trepidation this afternoon following the great orator, the Senator from South Carolina. I have watched him for many, many years and admired his ability and his great leadership in this body.

So, as a new Member of the Senate, I am hesitant to proceed behind this great Senator from South Carolina. I will do so, and I will begin my remarks here today by talking about something that has been concerning me throughout the discussions in the Armed Services Committee and here on the floor of the Senate—that is, even the use of the word "perception."

I have heard Senators on the Armed Services Committee and others outside of this great body, and Senators here, talk about the perception. It is the accumulation of the accusations, even though they may have been proven to be untrue or unfounded or totally hysterical. It is the accumulation of those allegations that seems to have created a perception that is wrong for a Secretary of Defense. I have to question that. Should we cast such a historical vote on the basis of what we perceive may or may not have been happening? I submit that is fundamentally wrong.

Also, I want to refer to some of the examples that have been given, not because of the examples themselves, but because of the timing and what they did to the process. We have all heard the story of the now famous Russian ballerina. But more important than that story, and the fact that it was totally baseless, was when it occurred. On February 8 or 9, the Senate Armed Services Committee was close to the point where we could have had a vote before the Senate went into recess for the Presidents Day recess. But this allegation appeared before the committee. I remember distinctly this Senator saying, "Now, that is a serious allegation. If there is any evidence whatsoever that any of that is true, I want to know about it." Certainly, I would have factored that into my thinking. So at that crucial juncture, when the Senate Armed Services Committee was about to vote, and in my opinion, would clearly have voted to confirm Senator John Tower, or recommend to the Senate that the Senate confirm John Tower, to be Secretary of Defense, the committee stopped and said, "No, we want this investigated." The FBI will need some time to check into it, and so we did not act on that pivotal February 8 or 9, and then 10 days went by.

When we returned from the Presidents Day recess, as I recall, around February 20 or 21, I checked on this and found that certainly there was no truth to it at all, but at a crucial moment we hesitated, because of what turned out to be an unfounded hysterical allegation of monumental proportions.

Then there was the second instance. For almost 1 whole day, and over a couple of days, a week or so ago, the committee was saying, well, there is a new allegation that the FBI needs time to look into. That appeared on the front page of the Washington Post. This is the one with regard to the "credible business person," Mr. DeBerge.

So the committee was saying we need to know whether these allegations of being perhaps in a condition of drinking too much in a Washington hotel are true. Once again, the committee was sort of immobilized as we questioned, is this true, are these dates and examples, and can it be corroborated?

Again, the committee hesitated, because we wanted to know if there was any truth to these allegations. A second time, it turned out that all three dates that were mentioned were not true, and it turned out that this credible businessman had a very clear partisan background, in fact, was a pollster, a political pollster, and a second time when we hesitated. These are all important, because of what they did to the process, and because of the time that was lost.

Now, a third time. The last couple of days, members of the committee have met in groups, and the Republicans have met to talk about this allegation, about this Air Force sergeant who alleged that Senator Tower came to Bergstrom Air Force Base and was out of order. He was drinking and acting indiscretely with a female member of the Air Force. So again we asked if this is true. In fact I had the media asking me, "Well, Senator, if you found out he did let his hand slide down in an untoward manner, would that affect you?" Should a Secretary of Defense act in that way? I started asking myself, well, yes, how would that affect you?

Again, it turned out that this witness was a witness who had a history, perhaps, of exaggeration, but it was on the front page of newspapers, and it caused the Members to hesitate. It caused the Senators to say, "I want to know. What are the details?

There are other examples of where the committee hesitated and did not go forward because of allegations which turned out to be totally unfounded, untrue, baseless. It has contributed to producing this swamp that we are now in, where we have lost sight of the bigger picture of what we are dealing with, and we are analyzing every blade in this swamp, every tree, every movement that occurs. I think we have lost sight of what really we should be dealing with here.

As a new Member of the Senate, but one who served in Congress for 16 years, I take the Senate's constitutional role of advice and consent very seriously. I have looked at the allegations and the evidence, keeping in mind what our roles should be. As a member of the Armed Services Committee, I have had a responsibility to be involved in the process right from the beginning, and, quite frankly, I have been perplexed and troubled by what I have seen and heard and the way the committee acted.

I could spend a lot of time talking about the limited number of witnesses that we did actually hear, the fact that the committee had almost no substantive discussion between he Members on both sides of the political aisle. We were talking about procedure, usually, or allegations that needed to be checked out.

A major concern I have pertains to Senate tradition. This body has certain standing rules and it also has a large number of precedents based upon interpretation of those rules over time. During the short period of time that I have been here, I have been looking at a number of Senate precedents, and I have learned that the Senate also has a number of unwritten rules that govern our relationships with each other—things like senatorial courtesy, reciprocity and yes, even expected standards of behavior for Members of this great body. We also have certain unwritten customs that guide our relationships with the executive branch—namely, the presumption that the President, especially a new President, should have the right to name his own Cabinet.

Mr. SYMMS. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LOTT. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. SYMMS. I want to compliment my dear friend of many years, who came to the other body when I did, and I say it is wonderful to have him here in this body, and I will be looking forward to working with him.

Mr. LOTT. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SYMMS. I did not have the privilege of being on the Armed Services Committee—if it was a privilege—while this partisan debacle took place, but I am interested in page 16 of the committee report, and I want to quote what it says. It says:

> . . . has brought to the Committee's attention personal knowledge of even a single incident calling into question John Tower's fitness to serve as Secretary of Defense. Rather, prior to the President's nomination of John Tower on January 20, 1989, 12 of those Members were asked for their opinion and gave their recommendation for John Tower to serve as Secretary of Defense. Among those giving such a favorable recommendation are 6 Democrat Members of this Committee.

Among those giving such favorable recommendations are six Democrats, members of this committee.

Was that discussed in the committee, the members of the committee who had recommended to George Bush on a point that the Senator asked?

I agree with the Senator that the President was elected; the elections are supposed to mean something. He should be able to choose a capable Cabinet officer of his choice.

But evidently, he called members of the committee and the very members of the committee who after some change of heart, for whatever reason, voted against him that told the President that they favored his nomination.

Is that public knowledge or was that ever discussed in the committee?

Mr. LOTT. It was mentioned peripherally by a number of members on a number of occasions. I think it probably was even referred to in some of our views.

I have here with me a number of quotes from Members of the Senate, some of the members of the committee who have just made laudatory remarks about Senator Tower to the high heavens about no limit to what he could do and hoping he would be involved.

But the Senator makes an important point. I have asked myself. I have asked present Senators and former Senators, including the great former Senator from Mississippi and chairman of the Armed Services Committee, John Stennis, "What about this process? What about this man?" And I have without exception found that our colleagues here have said that John Tower is a man of great ability, a man of experience, and that he is definitely qualified.

I have asked them, "Have you seen him inebriated or out of control or in a debilitating state at any time in performing his official duties or otherwise when he was acting out of order?" And without exception, the answer has been, we have never seen such a circumstance.

I do not understand why it is that Members of this body now forsake what they have seen and heard with their own eyes and accept allegations from unnamed sources all over this country who have come in anonymously and said, "Well, I heard this." Some of these allegations are in the fourth degree. This person heard it from another person who heard it from somebody else.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOTT. I am glad to yield further.

Mr. SYMMS. I come back: Were there six Senators who voted against Senator Tower in the committee that had told President Bush they thought he would be a good Senator?

Mr. LOTT. That is my understanding, no question. A number of committee members voted against him who earlier gave a clean bill of health to the Senator when interviewed by the FBI.

Mr. SYMMS. I hope some of the majority would explain that because that to me is hard for me to understand how you can suck and blow in the same breath. Either you are for him or against him. Of course, someone could change his mind.

It seems to me that at some point in time, a President, if he seeks advice and counsel from Senators, there should be some respect for the advice and counsel they give the President.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LOTT. I am glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Ohio to join in this discussion. Perhaps the Senator from Idaho would like to continue to participate in it.

Mr. GLENN. I want to make clear the only time I was asked—I probably was one of those six, but I was asked by the FBI if I knew any reason not to vote for him, and I said, no, that I did not at that time, and so I suppose I am probably counted in those who were not against him at that time. I learned a lot since then through all the hearings and reading the FBI reports, and that is the reason that I changed.

I was predisposed at that time to vote for him and said so. I wanted to have the hearings before I finally made up my mind. At each step along the way my predisposition was eroded by what I learned.

I probably was one of those listed, and I think the other members of the committee on our side had the same kind of circumstance apply.

Mr. LOTT. I thank the Senator for his comments. The Senator certainly has been diligent in his work.

I ask the Senate again: Do they not know this man? What are we doing to this man? You know, beyond the precedents and the tradition involving the President, what we are doing to the Defense Department? What about John Tower and all the accusations and innuendos that we are now being influenced by? And yet we know the man ourselves.

I did not serve in the Senate with John Tower, but I have known him for years, being a Member of the House of Representatives, and then I did serve for a year with him as cochairman of the Republican platform in 1980. I was with him all over this country, in cities from New York City to Los Angeles and St. Louis. I was with him long hours when we had hearings all day long from before 9 o'clock to after 6 o'clock, or even into the night. I was also with him socially.

Never once did he show any evidence that he was not doing anything but the best possible job. Never once did he show any influence of alcohol.

I have seen him with my own eyes time and time again.

Now, am I going to turn and be influenced by what has been brought before the Senate Armed Services Committee by an FBI investigation which was not sworn and which in many instances is contradicted by others?

So much of the material in that report that is favorable to John Tower, which we cannot give by name, is not being mentioned.

The President is trying to assemble his Cabinet. He has that right. I have been floored by what I have seen. I thought I had left straight party line votes in the other body where trench warfare is the order of the day. I did not expect it here. I thought it was going to be like all these other votes we have been having.

Yet in this case for some reason it seems to have spun out of control.

The President knows John Tower better than any of us, longer than most of us. He has seen everything that we have seen. He has made his choice. The Commander in Chief has picked the man that he wants to be Secretary of Defense, and it seems to me that Senate tradition would lead us, barring some debilitating evidence, some incapacity to perform, to ratify his recommendation.

In over 200 years, the Senate has rejected a President's nomination for the Cabinet only eight times. Never before in the first year of a President's new term. Never before a Secretary of Defense. Never before a former colleague that we know.

Are we now prepared to deny this President that right?

John Tower is certainly qualified. I do not want to repeat what others have said. But I have been impressed by his demeanor, by his tenacity, by his knowledge. And I have concluded that John Tower is enormously well qualified—by virtue of his education, by virtue of his experience in the Senate, by his experience as a arms control negotiator and an ambassador, and yes, based upon his experience in the private sector, which I believe will prove to be an asset in managing the Pentagon.

I did not think when I came to the Senate that I was entering a monastery to be a monk. Are we not when we leave this body going to be entitled to go work in the area where we have the greatest knowledge? That is where the man spent 24 years of his life, in the defense area. It was perfectly natural that he go in the private sector and work with defense contractors.

Does he have the temperament for the job? Absolutely. Is he a gladhander? No. Does he suffer fools gladly? Obviously not.

Has he bruised some egos around here? I did not realize how much. But apparently he has.

I would submit to the Senate that his tough demeanor and vast intellectual capabilities will be enormously valuable to the President and the administration at this time in providing exactly the kind of leadership that is required to strengthen and maintain our Nation's defense capabilities.

Does Senator Tower have a conflict of interest and will his former financial ties to defense contractors impair his judgment as Secretary? No! My friends, there is no conflict of interest. He did not go from the Senate right into the private sector. He went from the Senate to arms negotiator and then into the private sector.

John Tower indicated to the Armed Services Committee that he has severed all his ties to the companies for whom he furnished advice. He does not own any stock in any of the companies. He is not entitled to deferred compensation from any of the companies. And he has no contractual relationships of any kind with any of the companies.

Those of you in this room who know him better than I do know that John Tower would not put himself in a position of having a conflict of interest.

He said it himself best in his own words when he appeared this week before the National Press Club.

> Defense decisions can have no criterion save the preparedness of our military forces. There can be no favorite weapons—only effective weapons. Each service must understand that the Secretary of Defense is a person who can—and frequently does—say no.

And John Tower is a man who can say no.

And under current conditions, "no" is a word that must slip easily off the Secretary's tongue. There can be no favored contractor—only effective and honest ones. Defense contractors, by their performance, earn the responsibility—yes, the responsibility—to craft America's weapons.

John Tower, by his own words, has set out very lofty criteria that he will use as Secretary of Defense.

In 30 years of public service, including 24 years as a Member of this body and chairman of the Armed Services Committee for part of that service, there was never one iota of evidence that John Tower ever did anything to bring disfavor on the Senate or on the United States of America. Quite the contrary was true.

John Tower has always had the highest regard for his country and has always given top priority to what is in the foreign policy and national security interests of the United States. I would submit to the Senate that he will do no less if we vote to confirm him as Secretary of Defense.

What about the alleged improper actions with regard to women? We have talked about the recent situation with the Air Force personnel, a man named Jackson, but I think that this can best be described by the chairman of the committee's own words. Senator NUNN, both in the article in the paper today and in his remarks before the committee last week, said:

> I believe the committee's record on this issue demonstrates no finding of liaisons with female foreign nationals, and hence no security violations that such activities would entail. I also believe that the record does not support the allegation that the nominee exerted sexual pressure on employees and associates of the opposite sex.

So I think this issue has been laid to rest.

Has John Tower been known to have a drink? Sometimes too much perhaps, in the 1970's? Yes, he has acknowledged that. But there is also a lot of evidence, clear evidence, that in recent years his consumption has been in moderation and that it has not been a problem.

How many of us in this room would admit to that proclivity if really under the microscope like John Tower has been? But there is clear evidence, clear evidence, and many witnesses who have said that it has been substantially moderated in the 1980's. I am absolutely convinced it has been moderated.

And now John Tower has taken a pledge of abstinence with his promise to the American public not to "consume beverage alcohol of any type or form" if confirmed as Secretary of Defense, and has offered to resign if he violates that pledge.

What about his pledge of abstinence? Does it matter? Where I come from, when a man or a woman looks you in the eye and gives you their word, that is good enough. You do not have to write it down. You do not even have to shake hands. You understand. And if you break that pledge, your credibility is destroyed forever. John Tower has never broken his word or a pledge to any Member of this boby or to our country.

I am convinced that he is not an alcoholic, and I have been around a few in my life in my own family. I know how they act; I kown what they look like. If I were convinced that the evidence were to the contrary I would vote no on this confirmation.

I have also asked myself whether John Tower has any personal or moral problems that are debilitating? And, debilitating is an important criterion that I felt I had to answer for myself. And based upon what I have read in those FBI reports and the other documentation I have seen, there is no debilitating problem that would impair John Tower's performance as Secretary of Defense.

It seems to me, at least up to this point in time, that the accumulation of accusations has affected the attitude of the American people toward this nomination. But it is my hope that we can bring all the facts regarding the suitability of John Tower before the Senate and make all the facts available to the American public over the next several days, and I am hopeful that once we have done that, that a majority of Senators will conclude that John Tower deserves to be confirmed as Secretary of Defense.

Last Thursday, I said in the Armed Services Committee that I feared the committee vote would be based on the weight of the accusations—some of them not even qualified to be allegations—instead of on the weight of the evidence. I hope the Senate will not follow suit.

Let me now talk about some of the broader issues that really bother me. I worry about what we are doing to the President, to this President. I worry about what we are doing to the relationship between the President and the Senate. I worry about the new precedent that we are setting if we do in fact not confirm this nominee. I think it is going to have a very damaging effect.

Yesterday, in a joint session, we commemorated the 200th anniversary of the convening of the first Federal Congress, which met in New York City on March 4, 1789. As we commemorate this historic occasion, I think it is both important and appropriate to note that several traditions of the Senate will be broken if we vote to reject this nomination. And I don't think that is something to be taken lightly by any Senator.

The first is the general principle that the President should have the right to name his own Cabinet.

A second tradition that will fall by the wayside if the Senate votes to reject this nomination is that never in the 40 years that we have had a Department of Defense has the Senate ever rejected a Presidential nomination to head that Department.

And a third tradition that will go up in smoke is that the U.S. Senate has never ever voted down a current or former Member of this body whom a President nominated to his Cabinet.

I ask my colleagues whether they really are prepared to break that long tradition now?

There are many reasons why John Tower deserves to be confirmed as Secretary of Defense. But none are more important than the damaging impact that rejection of John Tower at this time would have on the Presidency and our country's national defense.

What message would rejection of a man whose name symbolizes a strong defense for America send to the Soviet Union at a time when Mr. Gorbachev is so anxious to coax the United States and our NATO allies into hastily arrived at concessions affecting the defense of Europe and the West?

What message would it send to some of our NATO allies who may be succumbing to the enchanting sounds of the sirens being beamed from Moscow?

It seems to me that some have forgotten that "peace through strength" is more than an empty slogan. This has been said many times but bears repeating once again. And that is, that it was the steadfastness of former President Reagan and the strength of his Presidency that made the INF Treaty possible.

It seems to me that if our new President and our NATO partners are to be successful in negotiating new arms control agreements that are in our national security interests, and I want to emphasize I am talking about agreements that are in our national security interests, then it is this Senator's strongly held belief that we should not do anything that would weaken the stature and authority of the Presidency. Yet that is exactly what we would be doing by rejecting President Bush's nominee for Secretary of Defense.

There are vital matters pertaining to our national defense that face the new administration—modernizing our land-based missiles, the future of SDI, how rapidly to proceed with the B-2 Stealth bomber, and setting overall budget priorities to meet our defense needs within the constraints imposed by a no-growth budget.

Momentous decisions must be made, and made without further delay. If we are to make the correct decisions, decisions that are in our foreign policy and national security interests, then we must have the best judgment and active participation of the Secretary of Defense. We are not doing our duty if we continue to leave a vacuum at the top of one of the most important Cabinet departments of the Federal Government.

And also I want to repeat again what this institution is doing and what we have done to this man. What we have done to John Tower no man should have to endure and no brave man would take sitting down. And he is not. He is fighting back. For this body to allow the kind of attacks that we have seen on this man is beyond me.

I have been reading the history of this great body, reading the book on the Senate by the former majority leader and current chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the distinguished senior Senator from West Virginia; a magnificent book.

I have also been reading the history of former Senators from my own State, men like L.Q.C. Lamar, a great statesman who did so much to bring this country back together. He served on the Supreme Court. He used to quote mythology. I was reading some of his speeches and came across one that I think applies to this body today. It was a case where Prometheus was bound to the rock, but it was not an eagle, but a vulture that buried his beak in the tortured vitals of the victim.

It is almost the way I feel here today. In acting upon this nomination, is this body, great institution that I feel so honored to serve in, going to soar like an eagle as it has in the past and do what is right in its relationship with the President and the defense of this country, our country. Or, like the vulture did to Prometheus, will we bury our beak in the vitals of our victim who has been one of our own?

We should not do that, my colleagues. The American people, I think, will realize and find when they have heard the whole story that this would be a grave mistake. Therefore, I urge that all of our colleagues read and reread the allegations. Do not be weighted down by the trees. Look at the big picture. Let us do what is right for this President and for this country.

If America is to meet the global challenges that confront us today, then the President and the Congress need the judgment and experience of a strong and effective Secretary of Defense. And we need it now.

I deeply believe that a compelling case has been made that John Tower possesses those qualifications. I hope that the Senate will act favorably on his nomination.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I wonder if my distinguished colleague and good friend from Mississippi would indulge in my trying to clarify one statement that he made, because I know he seeks accuracy. He made reference to the famous ballerina that dances on the desks here now in the Senate Chamber as being the cause for a delay. Let me refresh the Senator's recollection.

On the 7th of February, the Senate was visited by the President of the United States. Prior to his arrival, you may recall that we had a meeting of Republicans in our leader's office, Senator DOLE's office, and thereafter I indicated a willingness on behalf of the Republicans to move forward. As a matter of fact, I went right out in this Hall before the media and said we have had this meeting and we urged the chairman of the committee to move forward. We felt that it was time for a vote. Does the Senator recall that, I ask my distinguished colleague?

Mr. LOTT. I do recall that.

Mr. WARNER. Later that afternoon, Senator NUNN and I went down to visit with the President. We discussed, in a very free and friendly manner, the feelings of both Senators about procedures on this case, some reference to the facts and what we were endeavoring to do with the committee and what we were willing to do. And that afternoon—and the record thus far has not reflected this—but that afternoon Senator NUNN and I agreed with the President that we would meet the next day, the Armed Services Committee, and, if possible, reach a vote. But it was essential that we get in the remaining FBI report. And in the presence of all, right in the Oval Office, the counsel for the President said, "Mr President and Members of the Senate, that report will be available by the close of business tonight for your examination."

And with that understanding, we went back and we indicated to colleagues on both sides of the committee that we would have a meeting the next day and that we would have available for consideration the final FBI report. Senator NUNN waited in his office. I waited in my office. And at approximately 7 o'clock, counsel for the President called both of us, indicating that it was the determination of the White House staff that that report required further careful investigation, it could not be forthcoming the next day nor the following day. As a matter of fact, it was their judgment that evening that the report could not be completed until after the Senate returned from its recess of some 10 days. And that is exactly what happene±d. We went on recess and the report came back on the Monday.

So, the delay which the Senator made reference to was occasioned not by Chairman NUNN nor myself, but by the White House.

Mr. LOTT. If the Senator will let me comment briefly on that, he is absolutely correct. I did not mean to say that I found fault with the delay.

I did not mean to indicate it was the Armed Services Committee that caused it, or the Republicans, or the President. We all did. My point was, at that moment in conversation, the distinguished leader of our committee on our side of the aisle, from Virginia, will recall, I said if there is any chance at all if any of this is true, I want to know it. I was one of the ones that said we cannot vote until we know if there is one shred of evidence that this is true.

So I agree with him totally and I certainly cast no aspersions at him or the chairman or anybody in this instance. In fact if anybody has to bear part of the blame, I feel the burden. My point was, though, that event was what clearly made up my mind for me after reading the other evidence. When we came back and it turned out that this was such a bogus story, I said how long will this go on? How long can these allegations come in? And then there were others.

So I just want to emphasize your recollection is absolutely right. The White House indicated we could not get it and I and others said we must know the answers.

We have waited for the answers time and time and time again. In many instances the most horrible accusations have turned out to be baseless. So that was the point I was trying to make and I appreciate the Senator from Virginia giving me that opportunity to clarify.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, our distinguished colleague from Mississippi is correct. Time and time again he has worked with both sides of the aisle on this case and I think in a very fair way endeavoring to speak the truth.

Mr. President, I ask at this point in our colloquy that I might have printed in the RECORD the calendar of the work performed by the committee and the dates on which the Senate was in session.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPECTER. Mr. President, the proceedings on the nomination of John Tower for Secretary of Defense represent as I see it an intense struggle between the executive branch and the Senate of the United States for primacy in foreign policy and armed services policies that, I believe, is the basis for the hotly contested issue which we now have on this floor.

I personally believe that there yet remains a chance for John Tower's nomination to be successful. But I think the fact is that it is a steep, uphill fight at this time because people are dug in. There is an instinct, candidly, against John Tower because of his dominance as chairman of the Armed Services Committee in the past; because John Tower, as noted on this floor before has ruffled a great many feathers in this body, principally on the other side of the aisle but on the Republican side of the aisle as well, and because certain amenities were not followed early on by the White House in the dealings with the Armed Services Committee and its chairman.

But, Mr. President, I believe that there are matters of great import involved in this debate and I believe that, if we sort them out and come to grips with them on a number of levels, and deal with the essential facts, I believe that the American people will insist that the U.S. Senate confirm John Tower.

The critical aspect, Mr. President, is dealing with the facts, the hard facts in the case. Unfortunately, the rules of confidential communication have, to this point, excluded most of the hard facts from consideration by the Senate. It is my hope that before this proceeding is finished, we will be able to deal with all of those allegations and lay them bare on this floor. And I believe that if, as, and when that happens, it will be clear that there is no case against John Tower.

We have a curious situation. We are permitted to discuss on the floor of the Senate, consistent with rule 29, what has appeared in the media, but not what has been available to Senators in the FBI report.

We have gone in some length into the case of the Russian ballerina which captured nationwide attention on telvision and in the newspapers. The nominee dancing in an unclothed state with a ballerina on a piano top: Lurid, sensational, very deep impressions on those who hear about it. But now we find it to be absolutely false.

We heard about Sergeant Jackson's allegations about the nominee fondling someone in front of thousands of people and now we find it totally discredited for a number of reasons. In the face of that, those who oppose Senator Tower say well, we did not really consider it at all.

But as noted earlier on this floor, there are many people who have read that allegation who gave it obvious weight. If you take a look at the executive annex, which exists in Senate room 407, that is the No. 2 item in the arguments against the nominee. The No. 1 item is a reference back to the 1970's, which I think by all accounts is now an irrelevancy at this time.

Then we had the situation of the Arizona businessman that appeared in the press whose allegations against the nominee, when subjected to hard analysis, absolutely disintegrated.

There have been a number of very distinguished Senators who have taken the floor and said that they read the FBI report and there is a cumulation of evidence.

I have taken a very close look at the full FBI report and have taken a very close look at the executive analysis which the Democrats, have filed. I submit to this body that, if you take these charges one by one and analyze them, they disintegrate. If they were presented in a courtroom, the presenter would not get to the jury. They would be dismissed summarily because, on a piece-by-piece analysis, simply stated, there is no credibility.

An allegation is made and it is disputed by a dozen other witnesses, or by 20 other witnesses. And it is my hope that, before this process is finished, we will take up the matter in that kind of detail.

When we take a look at the committee report, it is a model of generalization. It is a model of a broad-brush approach. It lacks specificity in any respect. I submit that a fair reading of this report equally leads to the conclusion that John Tower ought to be confirmed, even though in its partisan direction they argumentatively seek to achieve a contrary conclusion.

The report deals with three essential concerns. They deal with the concern about womanizing. They say, at page 14:

29-059 O-90-22 (Pt. 3)

The committee's record on this issue demonstrates no finding of liaisons with female foreign nationals and, hence, no security violations that such activities would entail. Nor does the record support the allegation that the nominee exerted sexual pressure on employees and associates of the opposite sex.

On the issue involving women, there have been serious charges. But even the partisan majority comes to the conclusion that there is no basis in the record to find any impropriety on female foreign nationals, the lurid story about what allegedly was going on in Geneva. Try to erase that from the mind of the American jury. How many will read this report? And there is nothing to the allegation about exerting sexual pressure on employees and associates of the opposite sex.

Well, then, what does the report say? The report says: "There are, however, a number of examples of personal conduct which the committee found indiscreet." That is a vague, elusive, unsatisfactory definition for the committee to decide anything upon. But, Mr. President, even on their sense of indiscretion, whatever that may be, without any definition, when there is a review of the executive annex, and again I say I hope we get to that point, those indiscretions amount to virtually nothing. They do not amount to any kind of specific misconduct of any sort.

A second ground in the committee report raises the issue of activities as a defense industry consultant. The bulk of this matter speaks very favorably about Senator Tower in their analysis of this issue.

For example, at page 13, it is recited: "The committee has long recognized the importance of a healthy interchange between the public and private sectors, particularly in terms of encouraging people from industry with technical and managerial skills to engage in public service." They support a healthy interchange.

Then they say farther down on page 13: "The committee has no evidence that Senator Tower provided his clients with classified information."

What does the partisan majority finally conclude? They conclude that there is a problem with appearances.

Mr. President, I submit that the reliance upon perception and the reliance on appearances is fundamentally unfair to the nominee and wrong as a matter of fact. If there are no facts, then they raise the question of perception, but it seems to me that we have an obligation to find the facts and not to be beguiled or misled or draw conclusions because of perceptions.

If there is no reality behind the charges, then they talk about appearances. It reminds me very much about the lawyer who does not have the facts and he pounds the table; if he does not have the facts or the law he or she pounds the table.

That is precisely what this report does. There are no facts, there is no reality and there is consistent reliance on perception and what they categorize as appearance.

Pick up with me, if you will, page 14 of this report where the partisan majority quotes questioning by Senator LEVIN who says, addressing Senator Tower: "In that situation, without suggesting any impropriety in actuality, without suggesting in the slightest that you advised them of confidential or privileged information, just the fact that you are advising them, as you put it, on probable outcomes of those talks, do you see an appearance problem there? That is my question."

Senator Tower responds: "I do not see it, Senator, because the question has not been raised until now. Nobody has ever questioned me on that before now, and I have really not seen any press commentary on that. * * *"

Mr. SIMON. Will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. SPECTER. No. Others have commented that the line is a tough one to draw. The chairman is reported to have said that in the press, but this is a standard which all concede is brand new, tailored, apparently, to meet the facts of the matter at hand and to rely, as the committee does, on this exchange between Senator LEVIN and Senator Tower when the hard facts stated in the question suggest no "impropriety in actuality"—those are Senator LEVIN's words—"without suggesting in the slightest that you advised them of confidential or privileged information," but the entire conclusion is based upon what Senator LEVIN and the partisan majority conclude to be an appearance problem.

I would suggest, Mr. President, that a fair reading of the evidence and even the committee's own conclusions on this issue about being a defense industry consultant simply raise absolutely no substantive argument against Senator Tower.

Senator Tower left the Senate in January 1985 and shortly thereafter, I believe within about 2 weeks, he was asked by the Secretary of State to become the negotiator in Geneva. He put aside his intention to earn money on the outside, to go to work as a negotiator in Geneva at a salary, I believe, equivalent to what he made in the U.S. Senate. Certainly less than $100,000. We make $89,500, as we all know and were reminded of it fairly recently.

There is a question raised about Senator Tower because he earned somewhere in the neighborhood of $750,000 for a year's work. I am not sure if it was gross or if it was net. There were others who left the Senate at that time. One of our colleagues reported reliably in the media to earn as a lawyer in excess of $800,000 at the same time. If someone is in Government and is to leave Government and go out into the private sector, what prohibition is there to stop them from earning money if it is done in a way which is legal, if it is done in a way which does not divulge information?

The report concedes that there was nothing of "impropriety in actuality." The report concedes that there was no disclosure of "confidential or privileged information," and you have this man, Senator Tower, going out and earning a living, as everyone else does and not in excess of the terms of the amount of remuneration.

So, Mr. President, I believe that if you take these issues raised by the committee report on the defense industry consultant issue, you end up, again, with virtually nothing.

Then you come to the question of alcohol abuse. A substantial amount of the partisan committee report relates to matters in the 1970's, and their executive annex, again, does that. I submit, Mr. President, that on this RECORD at this time, the issue of the 1970's is an irrelevancy. There has been a statement by Senator Tower as to a problem at that time, and the issue really is focused on what has happened in the recent decade.

If you take a look there, the committee report talks about serious allegations. Then the committee report says there is also evidence on the other side of this question.

The committee report then refers to Senator Tower's performance as the chief U.S. negotiator at the START talks in Geneva and on the Tower board and concedes that, by all accounts, Senator Tower performed well in these assignments. There are also a large number of testimonials by distinguished Government officials and Members of the Senate.

Then there is later a conclusionary statement in the committee report about substantial evidence that this pattern from the 1970's continues into the 1980's. But, Mr. President, if you take a look at the document behind this one, the executive summary, which relies on certain FBI investigative lines, and without getting into the specifics because, regrettably at this stage, at least we cannot do that, there simply stated is no substantive basis for assertion that John Tower continued with an alcohol problem into the 1980's.

Mr. President, the substantial body of evidence on the record in the U.S. Senate is quite to the contrary. As the minority report noted, John Tower served in this body with 70 Members of the Senate who are here today, 14 members of the Armed Services Committee, aggregating some 650 years of experience with John Tower, the nominee. As the minority report notes, and no one has disputed it, there has never been one single incident calling into question John Tower's fitness to serve as Secretary of Defense.

Mr. President, on this Senate floor, I got to know John Tower pretty well. All of my own experiences with him were not exactly tranquil. I recall a 1982 summit resolution which I propounded that Senator Tower resisted vehemently, acerbically, testily. Frankly, I did not mind. It seemed to me the Senate floor was not an inappropriate place to have that kind of debate, and I came to see the enormous skill that everyone concedes John Tower has as a defense technician.

I also saw John Tower a great deal after hours, not socially, but on the floor of the U.S. Senate. As some of my colleagues have already commented, there are social annexes to the floor of the U.S. Senate. I went back and asked my staff to make a compendium of the late night votes that we had in the Senate where John Tower came to the floor in the presence of all of his colleagues.

In 1981, Mr. President, we had 47 votes after 9 o'clock at night. We had 11 votes after midnight. During the period from 1981 through 1984, we had 59 votes after midnight.

Some of those sessions went until about 6:30 in the morning. We had 36 votes between 11 o'clock and 12 o'clock. We had 44 votes between 10 and 11, 52 votes between 9 and 10. And John Tower was observed by some 80 or 90 or more of his colleagues on all those occasions, and not one person recollects or has come forward with a statement that John Tower was inebriated, drunk or out of control. I think that is highly significant. I do not recall all of those occasions, and I am sure I did not see John Tower on every one of the votes but I saw him on a lot of the votes. Every time I saw John Tower, even if it was the middle of the night, he looked like he stepped out of GQ with his inimitable style of the pin striped suit, usually a striped shirt, frequently a starched collar. The man was always immaculate. The man was always in control. And I could not attest to whether or not he had a drink, but he certainly was not under the influence of alcohol.

Is it not odd that in this body, with the 70 Members who were here with him during the course of his work in the Senate, no one ever saw this man intoxicated?

We have had statements by those who traveled with him. I was on the floor yesterday when Senator GARN commented about his travels with Senator Tower to the Soviet Union. We have been on those trips and they are long trips and they are late trips and there are cocktail parties on those trips. Senator GARN attested to the fact that John Tower was never inebriated. Senator COHEN commented to me, and perhaps repeated it on the floor, about a trip that he made with Senator Tower to the Mideast after the bombing of the Embassy, and there again it is a tough trip; it is a long trip; there are difficult circumstances. Somebody may have a drink or two. But Senator COHEN says John Tower was never inebriated, never out of control.

With that kind of knowledge, Mr. President, I would submit to you as a finder of fact, where you have 70 live witnesses who have been associated with this man for 650 years in the aggregate, who have seen him all night long on numerous, dozens of occasions, when you compare that to a few skimpy allegations in the FBI report, how can anyone possibly say that the evidence supports a conclusion of intoxication? It is just incomprehensible as a fact finder that this body could come to that conclusion. So why is this body coming to that conclusion? What is really going on in the Senate in this nomination? Is it the fact that John Tower was testy with some of his colleagues from time to time?

Mr. President, I believe that what we have here is really a battle, an intense struggle for primacy between article I officers, Senators, Congressmen, and the article II officer, the President of the United States. And you have seen it in quite a number of contexts. We have seen it in the debate last year on the INF Treaty and our debate on the ABM Treaty, narrow versus broad. We have seen it in our contests on the War Powers Act, we have seen it year before last in the debates on selection of a Supreme Court Justice, and now we see it on the selection of a Cabinet officer.

Mr. President, I believe that the exchange is a good and a healthy one. I believe that it is useful for America to have this difference of opinion on the separation of powers in this country, but on this occasion when we talk about an executive subordinate who can be fired by the President at will, we have simply gone too far—far too far.

I have been on the other end of the question when the Senate has confronted the President on some of these decisions between the article I and the article II officers. I believe that there has to be a different balance struck in the war powers situation on the congressional authority to declare war and the President's power as Commander in Chief, and it is no secret that I have opposed the President on some of his judicial selections. But when you come down to a Cabinet officer, somebody who is an assistant to the President and you have a recently elected President, it is an abomination that this body should interpose itself between George Bush and John Tower and to stop President Bush from having his selection of the man he chooses on the face of this record.

We have a constitutional responsibility under the advise and consent provisions of the Constitution, but we are getting a little too big for our britches when we apply it to a Cabinet officer in the context of this case. Our advise and consent function, Mr. President, applies in three areas—treaties, judicial appointments, and executive branch appointments. When it comes to the question of treaties, there is no doubt that the Senate exercises a policy judgment, and it is up to us to say whether or not we think the President's decision is correct for the national interest. On a treaty it is appropriate to place the Senate on a par with the President in the exercise of that policy judgment. When it comes to a judicial appointment, the Senate also has substantial prerogatives on advise and consent, because in that situation the article II officer the President appoints, the article I officer the Senate confirms, and for a new position on the court, the article III officers, those are lifetime appointments. They serve well beyond the term of the President, and the Senate has a different kind of a responsibility to advise and consent in that line. But when we come to an executive branch subordinate personnel job, Mr. President, the tradition and the scope of the Constitution is plain that the Senate does not pick the President's subordinates in the executive branch.

On only eight occurrences in the history of the United States has the Senate turned down a President's selection of Cabinet level appointment, and at no time at the beginning of a term with a President fresh from the electoral mandate as the circumstances are in the matter which we are debating.

Mr. President, the objection of the Senate is even more curious in light of the very substantial endorsements which John Tower has received from the Members of this body who now oppose his confirmation. This is not a matter of negative evidence that I referred to earlier when 70 of his colleagues saw him on many, many occasions, all not long, in a sober condition, and this is a situation where Members of this body have gone out of their way to make affirmative statements about his qualifications.

These may have been in the record before. But I would suggest to you that they are not insignificant. They may bear some repetition. As the minority report sets forth at pages 23 and 24, Senator Tower has received an endorsement in varying degrees from Senator NUNN, Senator BINGAMAN, Senator BYRD, Senator DECONCINI, Senator EXON, Senator PELL, Senator LEVIN, Senator GORE, Senator SHELBY, Senator DODD, and Senator BENTSEN.

Quite a number of those endorsements who spoke in very positive terms have now chosen to look the other way. Earlier Senator GLENN was on the floor and responded to a comment by Senator LOTT where Senator LOTT had raised this issue, and I think very cogently and very forcefully. Senator GLENN had made a statement that he learned a lot since.

But I would comment at this time that Senator GLENN's statement about Senator Tower was not a casual or an unsubstantial statement. This is what he said very recently on December 4, on CNN's Sunday Newsmaker: "I worked very closely with John when he was chairman of the Armed Services Committee in the Senate. So I have no doubt he'd make a good Secretary of Defense."

It seems to me that is a very forceful statement from a man who served in the Senate for a decade with John Tower.

I hope we get to the specifics of the FBI report so that Senator GLENN will have an opportunity without violating rule XXIX—he was on the floor yesterday and somebody challenged him to violate it—to tell us, tell the American people, specifically what it is that negates that 10 years of his knowledge and recommendation in positive terms for John Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

Senator NUNN—this has probably been quoted before, but I have not heard it stated, and there may be someone watching on C-SPAN who has not watched the entire proceedings, if there is anyone watching. Senator NUNN said this on June 7, 1984, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 6749, referring to Senator Tower:

> I submit that he has the background, the knowledge that are indispensable in the defense arena. I hope that whatever the future holds when he retires at the end of this session he will continue to involve himself in the defense arena and our foreign policy arena as well as in the overall involvement of every aspect of Government because his talent, wisdom, and experience are indeed national assets.

Mr. President, that is a good place to conclude.

I studied closely the FBI report. I have read the committee report line by line, syllable by syllable. I have looked at the executive annex. And I submit that when we get down to the fine print, the American people will agree with what Senator NUNN said about Senator Tower in 1984, that his talent, wisdom, and experience are indeed national assets and that he ought to involve himself in the defense arena and "every aspect of Government," which would certainly include the position of Secretary of Defense.

If the Senator from Illinois cares to ask me to yield for a question, I would be glad to do so.

Mr. SIMON. I would like to get my own time at this point.

Mr. SPECTER. In that event, I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORE). The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. I shall be fairly brief here. I think there are several fundamental questions. One is are we in fact exceeding the kind of balances that those who wrote our Constitution contemplated? The reality is 98 percent, 99 percent of the appointments by President Bush will be approved by this body without a dissenting vote. My recollection is in the last 2 days there has only been one dissenting vote on any of the President's nominees. That was from the other side of the aisle.

I do not think we are exceeding our authority. Clearly those who wrote our Constitution—in fact they contemplated the Senate being kind of a small advisory body to the President. Things have changed appreciably since then. But when they talked about advise and consent, it was not consent or nonconsent. It was advise and consent.

Second, I am concerned by this whole revolving door business that is taking place, the conflict of interest kind of situation that we are creating. Let me in fairness to Senator LEVIN who was quoted, and that is what I was going to ask my colleague from Pennsylvania to read—the sentence preceding the one I read—Senator LEVIN said:

> In your situation do you see that there is an appearance problem when the chief negotiator, an ambassador to START talks, then leaves those talks and advises clients who have a very heavy stake in the outcome of those talks?

I think this constant revolving door between consultants consulting with private industry and working for the Federal Government is something we ought to look at beyond the Tower nomination. I note that the Presiding Officer is on the Armed Services Committee, and our colleague, Senator DAVID PRYOR, has done a tremendous service in looking at consultants. But one of the realities is we have consultants right now who work for the Defense Department—I am told, who work for the Defense Department, work for the defense industry and for other countries all three at the same time. I think we ought to be doing something about that.

I do not know what the answer is. But I have great respect for the Presiding Officer, and I suggest that he, Senator PRYOR, and some others take a look at this thing.

But I do not think we ought to have a revolving door here involving the Secretary of Defense. He has in a 2-year period received $1,028,000 from the defense industry. There is a great deal of concern about what honararíums may do to our objectivity in this body. And I have seen editorial references to—the Wall Street Journal I remember specifically—members of the Armed Services Committee receiving $2,000 from a defense industry for making a speech in Phoenix or someplace. I think there are times when this honorarium thing needs to be examined, but there is a vast difference between receiving $2,000 for going out to Phoenix to make a speech and receiving $1,028,000. I think the appearance of impropriety is so strong that we have to look at that carefully.

Then there is the drinking problem. There is no question that he has had a drinking problem. Whether that continues to this day is a question, but we are not determining the guilt or innocence of someone. We are determining whether that person should be the Secretary of Defense. I ask myself, and I would suggest to my colleagues that they ask themselves, looking at that FBI record, and specifically in the matter of drinking, would you employ John Tower as a member of your staff? Well, I would have great hesitancy. If I were a defense contractor, I might employ him as a lobbyist. That is a different thing. And then I ask myself, if I were a colonel in the Army or the Air Force and John Tower were a captain, would I put him in charge of one strategic nuclear warhead installation, just one? Looking at the record, I would have to say, if I were a colonel and he were a captain, I could not put him in charge of one single strategic nuclear warhead. And if I would not put him in charge of one, I certainly should not put him in charge of 12,500 strategic warheads and 15,000 tactical nuclear warheads. I think it is very, very clear.

Then, finally, Mr. President, there is the question raised, Do we have a double standard? The answer is that we do have a double standard and we should have a double standard. I have a different standard for someone who is going to be Secretary of the Interior or Secretary of Transportation. If the Secretary of Transportation—and I want to make clear I have no disrespect to Sam Skinner, a very fine, new Secretary of Transportation, who is doing a great job—but if the Secretary of Transportation some evening has a little bit too much to drink, he is not going to do any great damage to this country. But if the Secretary of Defense has had a little too much to drink and at 2 a.m. he gets a phone call that Syria has invaded Israel or Pakistan has invaded India, what do we do?

I want someone who has that massive power of American lives in his hand to be clear-headed. The doubts that we have ought to be resolved in favor of the American public, and that suggests to me very, very clearly that we should reject this nomination, and

I trust we will do the right thing for the American people and reject the nomination.

I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. WALLOP. Are we following the rule of alternating, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will advise that there is no rule of alternating. The Chair recognized the Senator who first spoke asking for recognition, which was the Senator from Maryland. The Senator from Maryland is recognized.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The Senator from Wyoming understands there is no rule, but there was a decent habit started that we would alternate. Apparently, that decency has now ended, and my inquiry is, Is there anything in the rules of the Senate requiring decency?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will advise the Senator from Wyoming that the rules of procedure clearly provide that the Presiding Officer shall recognize that Senator who is first on her feet seeking recognition. The Senator from Maryland was clearly first in seeking recognition.

The Chair is following well-established rules of procedure, which are designed, in part, to guarantee decency and fairness to every Senator, regardless of party.

The Senator from Maryland is recognized.

Ms. MIKULSKI. I thank the Presiding Officer. I expect my statement will take only a few minutes, but it is one I do wish to make, and certainly the Senator from Wyoming will be able to speak his piece.

Mr. President, the Senate today meets in fulfillment of its constitutional duty to "advise and consent" on Presidential appointments.

The Founders of this country believed that the President should pick his or her own team. Essentially, they gave the U.S. Senate the opportunity to give the President a second opinion. That is what we are doing today and through this process, the nomination process and the confirmation of Cabinet officers. We give the President a second opinion.

Only the most significant policymakers require Senate confirmation—those whose appointment and service will have a direct and immediate impact on the national interest.

The question we address, therefore, is whether the confirmation of John Tower as Secretary of Defense would be in the national interest. When we evaluate the confirmation of John Tower as Secretary of Defense, we have to ask ourselves, what would be in the national interest?

In answering that question, we start with an understanding, shared by those on both sides of the aisle, that the President's nominees for key policymaking positions are entitled to every consideration and courtesy.

Indeed, this body has confirmed every nominee submitted by President Bush to date.

I have voted for all of those nominees, with the exception of one, where I was absent because of illness. With each of those nominations we asked the same questions and applied the same criteria we are applying to the Tower nomination.

The criteria I have used to assess whether the confirmation of John Tower would be in the national interest include the following:

One, does he have the knowledge of programs and policies of the Cabinet office over which he will preside.

No. two, is the nominee fit for duty; that is, sound of health and free of impairment?

Three, does the nominee have the integrity, judgment, and leadership to lead a Cabinet-level position?

Last, but certainly not at all least, in the Secretary of Defense, the question has to be asked, Does he have the ability to command? Most of all, does he have the ability to command respect of the men and women in our military, the respect of our own American people, and the respect of other governments, as he negotiates on behalf of the President and the people of the United States?

Today the Senate is not sitting as a jury, and Senator Tower is not in the dock. I have reviewed the FBI report on Senator Tower. I must tell you, it was a task that was far from pleasant. In reviewing that report, I found that there is no such thing as a smoking gun, no single event anyone can point to as disqualifying. What there is, however, is a pattern of behavior that runs through Senator Tower's activities and raises grave doubts about this nominee's judgment and leadership.

Senator Tower is experienced and well versed on the substantive issues related to the Department of Defense. He is highly intelligent and knows the Pentagon and its programs as well as anyone. On this one point there is unanimity.

My first concern stems from the Senator's entanglement with seven major defense firms. The Secretary of Defense cannot possibly eliminate himself from any decision affecting these companies. Otherwise, he will not be a Secretary of Defense. He will be a part-time, flex time, Secretary of Defense. Given his ties to these firms any decisions he makes become suspect.

I do not mean to imply that the Senator has acted improperly in representing these firms. But I do question his judgment in advising these firms about the very issues entrusted to him as one of our chief arms negotiators.

And I do question whether this nominee, walking so recently through the revolving door as he has, is the right response to a massive defense procurement scandal that has public confidence in the Pentagon at an all-time low.

Now, more than ever, the Pentagon needs a leader of unimpeachable integrity and judgment. Can we expect the public to believe that the hundreds of thousands of dollars Senator Tower received from defense contractors would not skew his judgment? Can anyone so closely allied with the contracting establishment clean out the rotten system of defense procurement?

Those are the questions that we must ask ourselves.

The Senator's personal life also merits concern. All of us as politicians have had our personal lives and our families held up to public scrutiny. That exposure is sometimes painful and often unfair but the public must be able to judge our dependability, work habits, and ethical standards.

The voters make that judgment on us Senators every 6 years and the House Members every 2 years. The Senate has the constitutional responsibility to make the same judment on the President's nominees.

Senator Tower's drinking habits are troublesome. I am not a physician, nor do I have the clinical training to evaluate whether Mr. Tower is an alcoholic.

What has been demonstrated is that the record establishes a clear pattern of alcohol abuse. I believe that anyone who reads the FBI report carefully and with an open mind comes away with some real misgivings, a feeling of uneasiness once one reads that report.

Then in the matter of women: with women playing an increasingly important role in our armed services, we need a Secretary of Defense who clearly respects women as professionals and who will personally uphold the basic standards of today's workplace and the standards we are trying to establish in the military. We are making a lot of progress.

I have spoken with high level military leaders who are providing excellent leadership combating domestic violence and substance abuse within the military and encouraging responsible behavior toward family and country.

As a member of the Board of Visitors of the U.S. Naval Academy, I have seen the outstanding efforts made there to extend fair treatment to women at the Academy and throughout the fleet. This has not been easy, but it has been done because of leadership—credible leadership.

The Secretary of Defense sets the tone of the armed services. A Secretary could seriously undermine the fine work now being done by many military commanders because of his own behavior, particularly if he so clearly demonstrates disrespect for women.

The phrase "conduct unbecoming an officer" is an important concept in the U.S. military tradition. It has been applied over the past 200 years in order to maintain a standard of behavior that inspires respect not only of the military but of us civilians, too. I believe the Senate should apply the same standard to the man who would be second in command in the United States.

Therefore, because I do not believe that this appointment is in the national interest, I will vote against the nomination of John Tower.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, will the Senator yield the floor before he gets into his remarks?

Mr. KASTEN. I am delighted to yield to my friend.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if it is his understanding and his certain knowledge that yesterday on the floor, the two leaders made an understanding and agreement that we would alternate between the parties for the debate on John Tower.

Mr. KASTEN. I was not on the floor, but I was listening, and it is my understanding that there was an arrangement, whether it was formal or informal I do not recall, but there was an arrangement whereby proponents and opponents, Republicans and Democrats, alternate back and forth.

Mr. WALLOP. It is true we did not have a unanimous consent agreement, that I understand, but there was clearly laid down the pattern that was to be.

That was the only thing I sought in the previous recognition.

I thank the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I rise today in strong support of the nomination of John Tower to be our country's Secetary of Defense.

For the last 3 months, we have been offered a steady diet of innuendo and rumor. We have heard much more than we will ever need from the three A's—accusation, allegation, and appearances. What has been largely missing is the F-word, a 4-letter word that many of us are shying away from as if it were impolite to use in our debate. The word I am referring to is "fact."

All I am asking my colleagues to do is to judge this nominee on the facts. Many of my colleagues in this Chamber are laywers; I am not. But I know enough about our American system of justice to recognize that an accusation is not a piece of evidence. Saying that someone said or did something is not the same as proving that he did, or even giving evidence that he did.

So let us judge this man on the facts. No fewer than 71 of the 100 Senators who will vote on Senator Tower's nomination actually served with him in the U.S. Senate. He is not a stranger whom we have to judge on allegations, hearsay, and third-hand reports. Many of us know him, and we can testify to his qualifications, his intelligence, and the integrity of his character.

As recently as last summer, I worked with Senator Tower on the Republican platform. He was an aggressive, intelligent, responsible, and a hard-working advocate of the defense policies he believed in.

I was cochairman of that Republican Platform Committee. I went head-to-head with John Tower on a number of issues, and I came away with this single conclusion: There is nobody I would rather have representing our country in high pressure negotiations than John Tower. When it comes to the defense of this country, John Tower is as forceful, forthright, and dependable as any public servant I have ever known.

And that is not just my own opinio ı. A public servant who has known John Tower for almost three decades, who has worked closely with him, and who will have to work closely with him once again if he is confirmed as Secretary of Defense, agrees with my own observations and conclusions about Senator Tower.

The public servant to whom I am referring is President George Bush.

As President of the United States, Mr. Bush is entitled to nominate the members of his own Cabinet. Under our constitutional prerogative of advice and consent, we in the Senate may—as we have done on very rare occasions in the past—choose to reject the President's nominee for a Cabinet post.

But in this case, if we were to reject the Tower nomination, we would be doing something worse than merely adding a ninth member to the group of Cabinet nominees rejected by the Senate.

We would be rejecting—based purely on innuendo and rumor—the judgment of a man who knows Senator Tower better than any of us do. We would be rejecting the considered opinion of a man who will have to bear many of the consequences himself, should Senator Tower prove an inadequate and unfit Secretary of Defense.

So, I ask all my colleagues to consult their consciences, and pay attention to what they really know about John Tower—not rumors or unproven allegations, but the facts they know and believe. The prinicple that "where there's smoke, there's fire" is not enough to hang a man in America. And it is certainly insufficient grounds for rejecting a President's nominee to be Secretary of Defense.

President Jack Kennedy was fond of observing that life is unfair. And it is true that not every injustice, every hurtful lie, every slander in the world is set right.

But we in the Senate have a rare opportunity to perform an act of justice, to say that yes, the truth should matter and the truth does matter. John Tower is a prisoner of a Kafkaesque maze of accusations—and it is in our power to free him from it.

Ten years from now, probably much sooner ever than that, this controversy will be forgotten. But in our consciences, each of us will have to live with the question, "Why did I vote the way I did on John Tower?" I want to live with the right choice—and that is a yes vote on John tower.

Mr. President, upstairs in room S-407, there are a number of black looseleaf binders. I have studied these documents for hours, and I agree with the distinguished Senator from Virginia—they are a conglomeration of fact, fiction, and fantasy. I urge all my colleagues to work through those documents and decide for themselves what is true and what is not true.

But much more importantly, in each of us, there is an intellect and a conscience; and I ask—as strongly as I know how—that each of my colleagues consult that conscience before we rush to judgment on Senator TOWER.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I will be brief, but I believe a couple of things have been mentioned on the floor today that merit comment. I am happy to see the able Senator from Maryland here who made note of the fact that no women have come forward endorsing or standing for John Tower.

I believe yesterday Mr. WARNER looked up at this press gallery and read them a letter signed by a number of America's most distinguished women and asked them why they had not printed it. We searched in vain today and they have not printed it. Apparently, the press does not yet care that a letter of this kind is in the public record. Therefore, it is no surprise that the able Senator from Maryland did not know of its existence, because the press has been able to play this in one certain way, too.

But if the Senator will just wait for a moment, I will read it to her. It reads:

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We have known Senator John Tower professionally and personally for a number of years. We are very aware of his 26-year record of outstanding public service to his country.

He served the people of Texas in the United States Senate for 24 years. They endorsed his performance in office by re-electing him three times, in each instance over a well-financed and strong opponent.

After retiring from the Senate where he held important policy and leadership positions, Senator Tower was asked by the President to handle some of the toughest and most delicate problems facing our country. He received public acclaim for his work as Chief Negotiator for the U.S. Strategic Arms talks in Geneva, and for his fairness and candor as Chairman of the President's Special Review Board which studied National Security Council operations in light of the Iran-Contra matter.

We all know the Senator well. Many of us worked as volunteers in his campaigns or as members of his staff. Many of us counseled with him on domestic policy or on sensitive matters of national security and defense. Others of us are simply his friend. But we all are convinced that President Bush has made an excellent choice in nominating Senator Tower as Secretary of Defense.

We urge you to bring his nomination to a prompt vote in the Senate Armed Services Committee and to recommend his confirmation as Secretry of Defense.

This is a letter sent after all of these charges—and I might say they are charges, unsubstantiated, of womanizing, et cetera, et cetera—this letter is dated the 17th of February and it is signed by Honey Alexander, a member of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting, Nashville, TN; Anne Armstrong, former Ambassador to Great Britain; Carol E. Dinkins, former U.S. Deputy Attorney General; Elizabeth Dole, Secretary of Labor; Patricia Hill, member of the Texas House of Representatives; Carla A. Hills, U.S. Trade Representative; Kay Bailey Hutchinson, former Chairman, National Transportation Safety Board; Jeane J. Kirkpatrick, Leavy professor of Government, Georgetown University; Cyndi Taylor Krier, member of the Texas State Senate; Sally F. McKenzie, vice chairman, Texas Women's Commission; Beryl B. Milburn, former chairman, Higher Education Coordinating Board, Austin, TX; Catherine Clark Mosbacher, attorney, Houston, TX; Cynthia Root Moran, former Assistant Secretary for Legislation, Department of Health and Human Services; Anna Mowery, member, Texas House of Representatives; Irene Wischer, president and chief executive officer, Panhandle Producing Co.; Jocelyn L. Straus, member, National Council on the Arts, San Antonio, TX; Greer Garson Fogelson, Dallas, TX; Jessica Catto, builder, Woody Creek, CO; and Nancy Kissinger.

So it is not surprising that the Senator from Maryland did not know this because the press, once again, refused to make this part of the RECORD.

But I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that it again be printed in the RECORD.

FEBRUARY 17, 1989.

Hon. SAM NUNN,
Chairman, Armed Services Committee, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We have known Senator John Tower professionally and personally for a number of years. We are very aware of his 26-year record of outstanding public service to his country.

He served the people of Texas in the United States Senate for 24 years. They endorsed his performance in office by re-electing him three times, in each instance over a well-financed and strong opponent.

We all know the Senator well. Many of us worked as volunteers in his campaigns or as members of his staff. Many of us counseled with him on domestic policy or on sensitive matters of national security and defense. Others of us are simply his friend. But we all are convinced that President Bush has made an excellent choice in nominating Senator Tower as Secretary of Defense.

We urge you to bring his nomination to a prompt vote in the Senate Armed Services Committee and to recommend his confirmation as Secretary of Defense.

(Mr. KERREY assumed the Chair.)

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, these are women, both common and uncommon, and they are women who have great presence and stature and reputation in America and they are just plain women of America who know this man. It is very unlikely that they, having known him in the variety of personal and professional situations in the life of Senator Tower, that they would be inclined to endorse a man with a reputation that has been sought to be portrayed in the diatribe that has been going on on the other side.

Let me talk just a minute about the revolving door and the Talmudic standard that the other side seems to wish to apply. They themselves, in their majority report, have found that there is no violation of law and we are now discussing whether one can be judged by an appearance, the criteria for the appearance of which has not been established by anybody.

The majority report in this thing is a matter of really curious dimensions. We are told that Senator Tower's work for defense contractors would represent a conflict of interest with his duties as Secretary of Defense. Did he violate any law? The answer is, no, he did not violate any law. Did he violate any Federal regulation? The answer is, no, he violated no Federal regulation.

What did he do wrong? Well, some regard the mere fact that his company made $1 million in 2½ years working for defense contractors as reason enough to vote against him. They do not draw the same standard against able former Democrats who represent those same people downtown at fees far larger than John Tower ever commanded. And yet they use those people as references to their judgment on the floor today. For instance, there is Mr. Clark Clifford, an able, able man, an honorable, honorable man. He certainly makes well over anything that John Tower has made and nobody, least of all this Senator, is accusing him of any kind of malfeasance. But then, again, he belongs to the other party and a new standard may now have been established for those of us who call ourselves Republicans.

Would they similarly vote against such distinguished Americans of their party as Mr. Harold Brown, the Secretary of Defense in the Carter administration, as well as an official of other administrations that preceded them? Or Mr. Robert McNamara, and many others? Or Mr. Frank Carlucci, who has been cited as a shining example of what a Secretary of Defense ought to be? And I endorse that. But the standard that applies to him is far lesser of a standard than that which they seek to apply to the President's nominee.

Was their objectivity, these gentlemen of whom I have spoken, clouded by their relationship to the defense world? No. Quite the contrary. They have, by those who seek to demean

John Tower, been heaped with praise and bona fides, both in the political world here and in the business world in which they operate.

Indeed, John Tower is one of the few Members of the Senate of his day that did not retire substantially richer than when he came here. The committee's finding is interesting, Mr. President. This is the majority of the committee speaking.

Senator Tower showed poor judgment by placing himself in a situation in which there was such an obvious tension between the information he acquired as an arms control negotiator and his obligations to his consulting clients.

But, it goes on to say:

The committee has no evidence—

Which is a standard that has not troubled them since—no evidence that Senator Tower provided his clients with classified information. In the committee's judgment, however, this situation created the appearance of using public office for private gain and casts doubt on his ability to command public confidence in the integrity of the defense acquisition system.

Mr. President, a curious question might just be asked of the world examining this. Whose judgment? What standards are we setting? Who has described those standards except to say that those which they have seen, they find at fault with Senator Tower but find it praiseworthy of other Secretaries of Defense. Praiseworthy, I say, because they are cited by Senator HOLLINGS and others as standards by which this nominee should be judged. Standards in the same arena in and under the same circumstances as those of Senator Tower.

So, are we to eliminate totally the point that those who know most about the defense acquisition business are, by definition, the least qualified by our standards to be Secretary of Defense?

Mr. President, that is a mind-boggling absurdity, in which experience, competence, understanding, and judgment are being used as tallies against the Senate's standards for confirmation.

What has been troubling the Department of Defense, Mr. President, is not competence. What has been troubling it is incompetence. And everybody, including this report, talks of John Tower's competence.

The chairman spoke of his competence. The former majority leader spoke of his competence. All kinds of people have chosen to speak of his competence and, as the Senator from Pennsylvania noted, speak of it spontaneously, without urging and without diminution.

But now, put their competence to use in the advice of the country and a mysterious standard says that it creates tension.

Hell, yes, it creates tension. It is tension between Congress, which has less of that competence, and John Tower, who has more of that competence, that is worrying some in the Senate today. And I have no doubt in my mind that that is the tension whereof they speak and not this Talmudic standard that he be held accountable to a reference that we have yet to define on pages yet to be written by people yet to decide.

The Senate is a mystical place sometimes. I have always been very proud to be here. I am trying hard to be proud to be here now, but I must say this process is something that really leaves that in doubt as the American people look at us.

The three most famous leaks among the barrels of leaks by which John Tower has been convicted in the press and in the minds of the majority party are the most absurd. The Senator from South Carolina, the Senator from Maryland, and others have cited the volume of accusations. It is hard to tell whether the volume of which they speak is one of decibels or the volume of number.

But it does not matter that in this volume there is no proof. It is merely volume, repetition. The Senator from South Carolina was talking about a hint, the hint of impropriety.

There, my friends, is a standard to judge. The hint of impropriety. One has but to call a talk show in the middle of the night and hint, and the hint of impropriety has tainted the candidate of the President of the United States for appointment to high office.

One has merely to go down and whisper in the FBI's ear, and the hint has been laid down as a standard.

Let me talk about those three most famous cases. Mr. DeBerg, cited by the Post as an independent businessman with no ax to grind, is a Democratic pollster and consultant, professedly never worked for the other side.

These three marvelous trips to Washington, in which he cites John Tower's drunkenness and disorderliness in the Jefferson Hotel, all took place at a moment in time when John Tower was, one out of the country; one in Dallas, TX; and one in Washington State.

So they called him up and told him that, and he said, "I must be mistaken," and he had a couple of other tries. He could not find a time when John Tower was in town.

But the volume, the repetition, the standard is only that it need be said, not that it need be true, not that it need even to be corroborated.

The Russian ballerina is a story so bizarre that it should not have been investigated in the first place. It was investigated primarily because it was leaked. And, therefore, it became a matter in the public domain and the trial by leak and the trial by transom continued. And after examination—and this has all been said in the public press—after examination we find that the accusation is totally baseless, totally groundless.

How do you get that to become a part of the judgment instead of a just a part of the record? The answer is, apparently, you do not.

Then we have Bob Woodward, that paragon of journalistic virtue and moral content, running with a story yesterday without even bothering to ascertain its validity, front page Washington Post, reported thereafter in all the papers, reported thereafter in the television shows of news worthiness, so they say and say for themselves—so it is spread all over America. The hint of impropriety is made, but the facts that verify the charge are not heard.

The man was not on active duty at the time when the supposed events took place. All those who witnessed John Tower's presence on that air base swear that it did not happen. And we find that this man is a man of some mental incompetence and under care. And I feel sorry for him. But I do not feel so sorry for him that I think that it is a bad idea to have come to John Tower's aid and assistance, trying to set the record straight. By glory this place is disgracing itself by following the path of believing all that is said as fact and all that is fact as immaterial.

What occurred in the Armed Services Committee last week is a travesty of justice. The Senator from South Carolina was saying John Tower could confront his accusers. He does not know who his accusers are. The only response he gets to make is after it has been leaked to the press. Everybody else is either "A" or "T" or anonymous.

He has not seen the report which some are using here to convict him in the minds of the public. "Polls show that John Tower is now not a popular man for this post." Why could they show any different when hints and leaks and charges are out and they take time to investigate, they wallow in the public's mind, they are repeated in the press, in the papers, on the television, and by the time the investigation comes out, it is no news anymore that he is exonerated, that they are without foundation, without corroboration because a new charge has been leaked.

I called this trial by transom, and I meant it was trial by transom.

The committee never should have entertained this succession of things which were prefectly orchestrated as to keep this committee and this Senate and the nominee in some kind of a desperate circumstance of always trying to answer something that just came in while the answer that exonerated him from the previous charge was messed up and missed because new charges appeared.

So it is, as the Senator said, the volume repeated often enough and it becomes fact, "factoid," like humaniod, those things which take on the appearance of and the standard of fact without ever having been related to the press for the standard that they would apply in other levels of journalism, let alone the standards that the lawyers in the Senate or any fair-minded American would ever apply to a case of law or to a circumstance of fairness. The Senate abandoned fairness and the object of that abandonment is John Tower.

We are seeing now an attempt to end, to finish, a final nail in a coffin of a long and distinguished political career in the service of the country that he loves, a military career, a political career, a diplomatic career, and a professional career—without so much as a look over our shoulders as to what it may be doing to him, his family, his friends, and his colleagues.

The dirt of this process is being spread on innocent people—his family, his associates, some in Geneva—and it is being spread without a concern or a care as the factual relations of it. Not a concern, not a care; nobody is willing to do anything except report the rumors and allegations. Far worse than the attempt of a destruction of a good man's career is the tremendous embarrassment that I feel for the Senate Armed Services Committee and for the Senate of the United States itself.

The nominations process is now a tool of connivance and a tool of raw power. Responsibilities accorded to the Senate by the American Constitution have been grossly distorted. Any pretense at civility is just that, a pretense. Any pretense at responsibility. Is now just that, a pretense. And any pretense at the recognition of the rights of individuals is now just that, a pretense.

Mr. President, I just leave with this. Mark Twain once said a lie is halfway around the world before the truth puts on its shoes. We have seen that repeated time and time again. It is time for the Senate to put a stop to it. It is unfair. It is unfair to the President of the United States; it is unfair to the nominee; it is unfair to his family; it is unfair to his friends, and it unfair to the Senate. We are better people, or have been, than we are being at this moment in time.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, it is my intention that the Senate will continue in session this afternoon for a period beyond the 3 o'clock time which I have previously indicated would be the time for no more votes, since I have already indicated that there will be no more votes today. There will be further debate on the nomination if Senators which to speak this afternoon.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the senior Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, it is extremely rare that I vote against the confirmation of any Presidential nominee. As a former Governor, I understand the need for an executive to have his team in place to assist him. However, despite my original intention before the hearings began, I could not now, in good conscience, support the confirmation of Senator Tower.

There have been many charges and allegations made about the nominee's personal and business behavior. Ninety percent of these are garbage and definitely unfounded, in my view. Nonetheless, there were serious allegations of continued drinking, personal indiscretions, and potential unethical business dealings. The Senate has the constitutional responsibility to review nominees and these serious charges deserved and received thorough and fair investigation.

The most recent FBI report clearly did not clear Senator Tower of these critical charges. Early on, there was not even established a serious drinking problem at all. The evidence is that Senator Tower's admitted drinking problem in the 1970's is not, in fact, behind him. This is very worrisome to me as the Secretary of Defense is the key Cabinet member in the chain of command controlling our nuclear forces. Any member of the Armed Forces with the same apparent problem as Senator Tower would be removed from such a position of responsibility. Is the standard set by the Secretary of Defense in this area important to our men and women in uniform? I think so.

Senator Tower's past business interests with defense industries also raises a troublesome appearance of favoritism and conflict of interest at the very time at which the President and the Congress are both committed to eliminating waste and fraud in the Pentagon.

My decision to vote against the confirmation was personally very difficult. I know Senator Tower well and served under his chairmanship on the Armed Services Committee. I have never seen him in any condition that would disqualify him, but that does not mean that such circumstances never existed. And it is very clear in the FBI report that other responsible individuals have seen otherwise.

I suggest that it is blind man's bluff to follow the argument that has been made contrary by very responsible people to what I personally know and have seen in John Tower.

His contribution to the Nation over the years as well as through the Tower Commission and his Ambassadorship to the arms control talks is great and worthy of thanks and praise. He has the knowledge and the experience to run the Pentagon. Nevertheless, after very careful study of all of the FBI and other reports, numerous meetings with many individuals and personal investigations, I conclude that the President should look elsewhere for a Secretary of Defense.

Many see the committee vote of 11 to 9 along party lines against Senator Tower as a partisan attack upon the President. Nothing could be further from the truth. As an outspoken advocate and leader for a strong national defense, I want a knowledgeable, aggressive, and strong Secretary of Defense, but he or she must have the trust and the faith of the American public which pays for national defense.

We face many challenges, Mr. President, in the area of national security and must deal squarely with them. The Nation must have a 24-hour a day Secretary of Defense. This is certainly not a partisan view. The partisan charges are without foundation. Every independent evaluation that I have seen of the comparative voting records have shown this Senator at the top or near the top of Democrats supporting key initiatives of the Reagan administration. That is also true for many of the other Democrats who have been leading the opposition to this nominee.

I made my choice after careful and fair thought. I do not criticize my colleagues on the Armed Services Committee who felt compelled to vote otherwise. The final decision is up to the full Senate now. However, I do hope that the vote will not be viewed in a partisan manner. After all, the Senate has overwhelmingly confirmed all of the President's other nominees to date. Furthermore, the Armed Services Committee has an outstanding record as a strong advocate of national security. It is a record which I am proud to have helped shape.

Mr. President, I will continue my efforts in this regard and support an individual who I believe is fully capable of leading the Department of Defense in these challenging times, an individual who can, without any question, preside over our national defense establishment and represent the President of the United States around the world in this area.

Mr. President, in conclusion, I would like to read into the RECORD at this time a very brief statement that I made before the Armed Services Committee voted on this matter on Thursday last which I believe better than anything else sums up my position on this matter.

Like all committee Members, this has been for me a painful experience and when the hearings began I fully intended to support the nominee. As the hearings progressed I experienced increasing concerns in a series of areas, but primarily with regard to the drinking problem.

After sweating it out, like all of us have, I finally came to the conclusion, right or wrong, that in the final analysis my conscience would not tolerate a positive vote. I came to the realization that it was my best judgment, while conceding that I might be in error, that the overriding consideration has to be what I thought was best for our national security interests.

Therefore, notwithstanding the significant contributions that John Tower has made to national defense and his considerable expertise in this area and his obvious basic qualifications, we should look elsewhere for a Secretary of Defense.

All other things aside, although the whole picture is important, the drinking problem caused me the most concern.

John Tower testified in open and closed sessions that we could not tolerate a Secretary of Defense who had a drinking problem. The nominee has refuted any and all allegations as untrue with regard to alcohol abuse, conflict of interest and sexual excesses.

In rebuttal to those denials, I would cite the many firsthand reports (as opposed to second or third-hand reports) in the FBI file that are in sharp disagreement with those statements by John Tower. The specific details are available to individual Senators in the classified FBI file.

Let me insert here, Mr. President, that that FBI file is a classified document. It is the property of the President of the United States, and this Senator has never leaked one word of that in any fashion to any unauthorized person.

I am aware of the many sound individuals in the FBI report that maintain John Tower either never had a drinking problem or has it licked.

Indeed, if I had been interviewed before the hearings by certain individuals about this and at that time I said I knew nothing about them and that had I been voting at that time, before the hearing

I would have given John Tower a positive rating.

Like most members of the committee, I have never seen John Tower inebriated, and we may incorrectly assume he is only a "social drinker." It is unwise, I suggest, to maintain that just because a Member of the Senate has not personally seen indiscretions, they do not exist. The system may not always be entirely fair, but it works. As I have said many times in the past two weeks, 90 percent of all of the charges and allegations inside and outside the FBI report were unfair garbage. The remaining 10 percent were major enough to give me concern.

I do not want to be prudish, but I believe there is more than adequate established patterns of serious concern, including a possible alcohol problem and a clear pattern of behavior around women that at best is unbecoming for a Secretary of Defense. All of this is of a very highly questionable nature and certainly is not an example for the Secretary of Defense to set for the professional military personnel under his direction.

The key test is that notwithstanding the White House spin control on the FBI report, John Tower would most likely not qualify for duty at the Strategic Air Command Center in Omaha. He has exceptional talents that could be put to use, but with regrets I must conclude not as the Secretary of Defense.

I hope that we can support this nomination and send it to the floor of the Senate for that purpose but with a negative recommendation.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Republican leader.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to make two points and I will take just a few moments. I know other Members have been waiting to speak.

First, there has been a lot of discussion here about the revolving door, and I want to start out as I have I hope every other day, not start off with a bad cold but to indicate that it is still my hope we can find a bipartisan majority in this Senate for the nomination. I have spoken to President Bush this afternoon. He has been with Senator Tower today. He went to the Pentagon, had a meeting there.

So every effort is being made by the President, and I have said many times before that Senator Tower is willing to meet any Senator, any time, any place to discuss the nomination.

So I want to urge my colleagues—I have in the past—to see if we cannot find a way to resolve this issue. It is an important issue. It is important to the President of the United States. It is important to the Senate. It is obviously important to John Tower. He may be third in that order.

I heard a number of my colleagues say I am going to vote against him because of the revolving door issue. This is not a new concept to this body. In fact, the Senate has passed and the President signed into law seven different statutes which apply to Government and former Government officials with respect to post-Government employment.

At this point, I ask unanimous consent that a memorandum which identifies and explains each statute be made a part of the RECORD in order that the Senate may refresh its memory on what is and what is not acceptable behavior by these officials and former officials of the U.S. Government.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POST-EMPLOYMENT "REVOLVING DOOR" RESTRICTIONS ON DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE PERSONNEL

Officers and employees of the Department of Defense are subject to a number of post-employment "revolving door" restrictions on employment in the private sector after leaving government or military service. These restrictions fall into three broad categories. First, there are restrictions on contacts with one's former agency or service after an individual leaves government or military service. Second, there are requirements for disqualification of individuals in specified circumstances from participating in activities with respect to a government contractor (e.g. contract negotiations) while that individual is still in government or military service. Third, there are prohibitions against individuals receiving compensation from a contractor in cases in which such individuals, in the two years prior to leaving government or military service, were substantially engaged in procurement functions affecting that contractor. The laws in each of these areas are:

1. RESTRICTIONS ON AN INDIVIDUAL'S CONTACTS WITH HIS FORMER AGENCY OR SERVICE

18 U.S.C. 207

This law applies to all former officers and employees of the Executive Branch. This post-employment conflict-of-interest law generally affects representational or advocacy type of activities of former Executive Branch employees appearing before the Federal government. The law consists of the following series of bans:

A lifetime ban on "switching sides," that is, acting as an agent or attorney, otherwise representing a private party or advocating before the Federal government, or in a court action in which the government is a party or is interested, on any "particular matter involving specific parties" on which the employee had worked "personally and subtantially" while in the government (18 U.S.C. 207(a)).

A two-year ban on "switching sides" on any "particular matter involving specific parties" which had been under the "official responsibilities" of the former employee during the last year of his government service (18 U.S.C. 207(b)(i)).

A two-year ban for senior-level government officials (i.e. those compensated in the Executive Schedule, certain designated GS-17's and above, and military officers compensated at O-9 and above) on "aiding or assisting" private parties with their advocacy or arguments, by way of personal appearance before the government concerning a particular matter on which the former official had worked personally and substantially while with the government (18 U.S.C. 207(b)(ii)).

A one-year ban for senior level government officials on making representational or advocacy contacts on any matter to the agency in which the official had been employed while with the govenment (18 U.S.C. 207(c)).

The penalties for violation of this law are a fine of up to $10,000, imprisonment for not more than two years, or both.

18 U.S.C. 281

This law applies only to retired Regular military officers. Such individuals are prohibited from receiving any compensation for the representation of any person in the sale of anything to the United States through the military department in which the officer was retired. The penalties for violation are a fine (unspecified), up to two years in prison or both. In addition, 18 U.S.C. 281 prohibits retired Regular officers, for a two-year period after retirement, from acting as an agent or attorney for the prosecution of any claim against the United States involving his military department or involving any subject matter with which the retired officer was directly connected while on active duty. The penalties for violation are a fine, up to one year in prison or both.

37 U.S.C. 801

This law applies only to retired Regular military officers. Such officers are prohibited from "selling or contracting or negotiating to sell supplies or war materials" to any agency of the Department of Defense or Coast Guard for three years after their retirement. The penalty for violating this law is forfeiture of retirement pay for the three-year period after retirement.

2. REQUIREMENTS FOR DISQUALIFICATION OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES FROM PARTICIPATING IN ACTIVITIES WITH RESPECT TO A CONTRACTOR

18 U.S.C. 208

The restrictions in this law apply to all employees and officers of the Executive Branch. It requires that in cases in which an individual begins "negotiating" future employment with a private concern, that employee or officer must disqualify himself from any official government duties, such as recommendations, advice, or decision-making, on any matter which would affect the financial interests of that potential private employer. The penalties for violation are a fine of up to $10,000, not more than two years in prison or both.

10 U.S.C. 2397a

This requirement applies only to DoD civilian employees at GS-11 and above and military officers at grade 0-4 and above. A covered individual who has participated in "a procurement function in connection with a contract award by the Department of Defense" must report any contacts by the contractor regarding future employment and disqualify himself from participating in procurement functions with respect to the contractor during the period of future employment discussions. A covered individual is not required to report and disqualify himself if he terminates discussions about future employment on the first contact. The penalties for violation of this law are a prohibition on the individual accepting employment from the contractor for 10 years and an administrative penalty of up to $10,000.

3. PROHIBITIONS AGAINST RECEIVING ANY COMPENSATION FROM A CONTRACTOR IN CASES WHERE MILITARY OFFICERS OR GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES WERE ENGAGED IN PROCUREMENT FUNCTIONS INVOLVING THAT CONTRACTOR PRIOR TO LEAVING GOVERNMENT OR MILITARY SERVICE

10 U.S.C. 2397b

This restriction affects DoD civilian and military personnel only. The law provides a two-year ban on specified former DoD employees or military officers receiving compensation of more than $250 from a defense contractor (with over $10 million in annual business with DoD) if these individuals had official procurement duties relating to that contractor during the two-year period prior to leaving government or military service.

The two-year ban applies to former DoD employees at GS-11 and above and military officers at grade 0-4 and above who had performed a procurement function on the majority of their working days at a site or plant of the contractor, or on a major defense system where the duties involved decisionmaking affecting the contractor. For the purposes of this law, a procurement function is defined as:

(A) the negotiation, award, administration, or approval of the contract;

(B) the selection of a contractor;

(C) the approval of changes in the contract;

(D) quality assurance, operational and developmental testing, the approval of payment, or auditing under the contract; or

(E) the management of the procurement program.

Also covered are former employees or officials paid at the rate of a Senior Executive Service position, or former military personnel at grade 0-7 or above, who acted as one of the primary representatives of the government in negotiating contracts or claims of over $10 million affecting the contractor.

The penalties for violation are a civil fine of up to $250,000 for the former employee or officer and a civil fine of up to $500,000 for any contractor who knowingly hires a former DoD officer or employee in violation of the law.

This legislation was effective on April 16, 1987.

10 U.S.C. 2397c

All defense contracts in excess of $100,000 are required to contain a clause stating that the contractor agrees not to compensate anyone in violation of 10 U.S.C. 2397b. In addition all DoD contractors with contracts totalling $10 million or more in any year are required to provide detailed information on all former DoD officers and employees who were provided compensation if that compensation was provided within two years after the former officers or employees left government service. The Secretary of Defense is required to review these reports, which are due no later than April 1 for the preceding year, and refer possible violations of 10 U.S.C. 2397b to the Attorney General.

This legislation was effective on April 16, 1987.

APPLICATION TO SENATOR TOWER

Mr. DOLE. Two, or at least parts of two, of these statutes apply to Senator Tower due to his employment by the Department of State as an arms control negotiator.

The other five statutes apply only to civilian and/or military personnel in the Department of Defense, and clearly do not apply to Senator Tower.

The two which do apply are 18 U.S.C. 207 and 18 U.S.C. 208, which apply to all officers and employees in the executive branch.

The first involves "representing" or "advocating" before the Government on "particular matters involving specific parties." It further imposes a 1-year "cooling off" period for jobs which are listed by the Federal Government. The position held by John Tower was not on this list during his tenure in the Government.

The second involves making specific decisions regarding private concerns after having been approached for employment by the private concern. While this law would cover Senator Tower, no allegation of which I am aware suggests he negotiated for employment prior to leaving Government service. This, then, exempts Senator Tower from the second statute.

STATE DEPARTMENT REGULATION

Mr. President, in his remarks of yesterday, the distinguished chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Senator NUNN, appeared to suggest that his concern over the revolving door was not these statutes but with a Department of State regulation covering the "disclosure of inside information."

To be fair and ensure the record is complete, I would like to complete the partial quotation of the regulation which was used yesterday. This was used yesterday:

Former employees may not disclose to future employers or the public any classified or administratively controlled information or any other "inside" information (including business secrets) acquired in the course of official duties, without the specific prior authorization of the Department.

Mr. President, I believe the chairman is referring to this in his remarks. However, the regulation goes on to say, and immediately following that is this:

Former employees are not required to purge their minds of the experience, understanding, or insight gained during their time with the Government, but must take care not to communicate any confidential information to subsequent employers.

Mr. President, I would suggest that prior to any further suggestion of impropriety on behalf of Senator Tower regarding the revolving door is made, Senators acquaint themselves with the law and regulations, and my review indicates the charges are not well founded. That is the first point.

Mr. President, on March 2, the Chair made serveral statements with regard to the FBI report which I feel deserve further explanation. Let me tell you why. Many of us are trying to make a judgment. Some have already made a judgment based on what they may have found or think they found in the FBI report. We are constrained, I guess almost totally, from making any reference to that report, even maybe where it is located. We have all done that.

It seems to me until we can have a full and complete discussion, we can have a give and take, we can talk about the witnesses and their credibility and how many there were on one side or the other. Nobody can come out here and quote something out of the report and refer to it, and say "I made up my mind based on what I saw in the report." Maybe one person had that particular conclusion in that report, and maybe 10 had another conclusion.

As I have told the majority leader, I am not trying to surprise anybody. I gave these questions I am going to ask to the Parliamentarian. They are just parliamentary inquiries on how far we can go in the report.

I would ask the Parliamentarian—and these are parliamentary inquiries—a series of parliamentary inquiries.

No. 1. Is it permissible to refer to the number of witnesses who were interviewed by the FBI in compiling the report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, it would not be.

Mr. DOLE. Is it permissible to refer to the ratio of favorable to unfavorable witnesses contained in the report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, no.

Mr. DOLE. Can names be cited from the report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, no.

Mr. DOLE. Can references identifying persons by other characterizations than by names be used such as profession, qualifications as a witness, date of interview, date of alleged occurrence?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, no. In the opinion of the Chair, in addition, if that Senator demonstrates that information had already been in the public or was in the public domain, an exception could be made.

Mr. DOLE. Can places be referred to such as areas of this country or cities or specific places like the La Colline Restaurant?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, no.

Mr. DOLE. Can the nominee John Tower go to S-407 to see this report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, I do not have a basis to make that judgment.

Mr. DOLE. Can a Senator read from notes about the report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator cannot read from notes.

Mr. DOLE. Are quotations or phrases allowed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Once again, in the opinion of the Chair, no.

Mr. DOLE. Are references to isolated words allowed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The same, in the opinion of the Chair, no.

Mr. DOLE. Can you refer to the number of anonymous phone calls which are cited in the report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, no.

Mr. DOLE. Can one refer to anonymous letters in the report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Again, no, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. DOLE. It is possible to refer to the Senator's interviewed by the FBI?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The same answer, again with the proviso only to the extent that it is known already in the public domain.

Mr. DOLE. That would apply to others interviewed, Congressmen, Cabinet officers, Ambassadors, service Secretaries, current and former female employees of Senator Tower?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That would apply.

Mr. DOLE. The Chair stated on yesterday information which has been published in the national media was no longer under the injunction of rule XXIX, specifically that information no longer appeared to be confidential. Is that still the view of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Only to the extent that the Senator can demonstrate the information had already been in the public could the Senator reference it on the floor in the opinion of the Chair. The opinion of the Chair is that no Senator can reveal information that is in the FBI report.

Mr. DOLE. But if I read an article say from the Washington Post, and that article included information which may be contained in the FBI report in S-407, then I have the right. I could read the entire article in the record. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct. The Senator would not be able to assert the accuracy or deny the accuracy of the report on meaning.

Mr. DOLE. But I can read it as a report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, yes.

Mr. DOLE. I cannot say then that I know this to be true?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. In the opinion of the Chair, that is correct.

Mr. DOLE. Neither could I deny that it was not true?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. DOLE. I know that other Senators may have other areas of interest but I think, and again I do not fault the Chair, he is correct. What many of us are trying to do because we understand the importance of fairness to the nominee, and also to our colleagues, only 20 Members of this body are on the committee. The rest of us have read the report, some read it more than once, some may have read parts of it, and there are undecided Senators on both sides of the aisle who are looking for information, facts.

I do not fault the Parliamentarian for the answers to the inquiries, but I do fault the process, which I think is clearly unfair to our former colleague, John Tower, and it would be unfair to anybody else, former colleague or not.

John Tower cannot see the FBI report. I understand that he could do so through the Freedom of Information Act, but that would be 30 days or more.

So we can come out and state our conclusions based upon what we have seen in the report, and everybody says the FBI report is a dominant factor in this whole process. There are only four witnesses. They were not sworn. He could repudiate in a closed session what they said in a public session. No one has cross-examined the people who have given information to the FBI. No one has tested their veracity, tested their credibility. They were simply interviewed for a number of reasons that none of us can refer to, and I think it puts all of us in a bad light, notwithstanding the thorough job done by the committee under the circumstances. I do not quarrel with that. But did we do enough?

Has the nominee, as indicated by a number of commentators, been fairly treated? Nameless accusers are totally unknown to the nominee. Somebody makes a call, and the FBI goes out and writes up a report, and some Senator reads it and decides to vote against Tower on that basis, or maybe to vote for Tower on that basis, even though that Senator may have known Tower for 20 years. They receive those anonymous telephone calls, letters, aliases, and all the rest.

I listened to the distinguished chairman earlier about his difficulty. But what are the alternatives? There are a number of them. Some may be good, some may be bad, and they are all fraught with danger, I assume, in the minds of some.

If I understand the Senate—and I have been here some time—there is not one person in this Chamber now or at any time that I know of who does not want everyone to have a fair shot. We may totally disagree with them, may have no intention of changing our mind or supporting whatever some other Senator may have on his mind; but the one thing we have always prided ourselves on was fairness, due process.

Due process applies not just to the courts but also to individual rights in any event in America, and John Tower is entitled to due process, just as we would like to be entitled to fairness and due process. How do we achieve it, with all the limitations?

According to the Parliamentarian, I would guess that there are a number of us on both sides who violated the spirit of his opinions. I said last week, publicly, how many witnesses have been interviewed. I learn now that I should not say that. I have even indicated that there was a pretty good favorable-to-unfavorable ratio, and I understand that that cannot be discussed.

Other Senators, on both sides, have picked out words. Even earlier today, one Senator was referring to a party in New York, obviously referring to the report.

It makes it very difficult to have a full and complete debate unless we go into a closed session. That is an option that remains. I do not suggest it, but at least it was considered or thought of earlier on by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. NUNN] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WARNER]. Senator WARNER talked to me about it. But there are other ways to get at the truth, maybe in a closed session.

Therefore, Mr. President, I am considering asking unanimous consent—I will not do it today—that this body give our former colleague, John Tower, the opportunity to answer the charges against him. The request would be that John Tower be allowed to come to this Chamber and to stand in this well and to answer his critics, face to face, charge by charge, rumor by rumor, and fact to fact, and to state his case to those Senators who are truly undecided, on both sides of the aisle, and to those who have made up their minds. There might be a change, either way.

If the unanimous-consent request would be objected to, then a motion could be made, following the lead of a former Republican leader some 56 years ago.

On February 3, 1933, Senator James Watson of Indiana made a motion to bring the Sergeant at Arms before the Senate. I quote Senator Watson:

> For the purpose of answering such questions as may be asked of him and to make an explanation he may have in mind on the merits of the proposition.

The Democratic leader at that time was Joseph Robinson of Arkansas. He supported the motion, made a statement in favor of it, and saw that it was adopted.

There is other precedent for that privileged motion.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I have one more paragraph.

On February 9, 1934, another request was made. An officer of Northwest Airways was allowed to make a statement and was questioned by Senators about airmail contracts with the United States.

If we owe Senator Tower anything, whatever may happen in the end, we owe him a right to say, "I have had my day in court." Oh, yes, I know that he has been questioned by members of the Armed Services Committee. As I have said, there are only 20 of us on that committee.

It has been said that six on the majority side were disposed at one time to vote for Senator Tower, and they changed their minds somewhere along the way.

Somebody may have a better idea. Maybe this idea will be rejected. Maybe the motion—and I do not intend to do it today—would be tabled, and maybe the unanimous-consent request would be objected to.

I was asked by a colleague on the other side, a few days ago, "Let's have a high-level debate." I think we all want to do that, and I think that so far we have had a pretty high level, objective debate. Obviously, some people have different views. That is what a debate is all about.

So, Mr. President, those of us who are committed to the confirmation of the nomination of John Tower, having read the FBI report and believe that we can reach only one conclusion—unless we are going to have a double standard for former colleagues and a higher standard than has ever been imposed on any other one in history—believe we ought to consider some way to do this.

There are other things that could be done. We could recommit the nomination back to the committee for witnesses. That is an option.

Again, that was at least floated at one time by the chairman. Maybe it might be necessary.

I hope that however we finally vote and whatever the final outcome may be, we can all walk out of here with our heads high and say that we gave John Tower every opportunity to demonstrate that he was qualified and that we gave the President of the United States, who has a right to nominate, every opportunity.

Maybe there is no precedent for someone seeking Cabinet nomination coming into this Chamber, but there is no precedent I can find in the last 200 years—we just celebrated that yesterday in the House Chamber—of any President in this state of his Presidency being turned down by the Senate on a Cabinet nomination after he has determined the fitness and competency of the nominee. So there may be a lot of history being made.

But what we want to make in the process is a fair judgment. I wanted to make that statement today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, the distinguished Republican leader has raised a series of questions which are serious and which trouble all Senators.

We all want to give Senator Tower total fairness as we should every nominee and as we should every issue that confronts us.

I know that the distinguished Republican leader did not intend to create any misimpression with respect to the FBI reports.

But I think a person who had not followed the entire debate might not be fully aware just from his statement as to who it is that controls release of the FBI reports.

In his opening remarks, when the nomination first came before the Senate, Senator NUNN placed into the RECORD a series of documents regarding those reports. They were the product of discussions between Senators NUNN and WARNER and the counsel to the President.

I think it important, and I know the distinguished Republican leader and Senator WARNER would agree, that it be clearly understood that as stated in this document signed by the counsel to the President acting in behalf of the President referring to the FBI reports:

> These documents are the property of the executive branch. The counsel to the President has agreed to make available to the Senate Armed Services Committee four copies of the Federal Bureau of Investigations summary of its background investigation of Senator Tower.

So there ought not to be any misunderstanding on any person's part, either any Senator or any person outside the Senate, as to whose property these documents are, as to who controls access to them, as to who controls their release or failure to release.

It is my understanding that the members of the committee deliberated on this matter, that the chairman, Senator NUNN, the ranking member, Senator WARNER, and the President's counsel, discussed the question of releasing these reports, either in original or what was referred to as sanitized form, and that they concluded unanimously, the President's counsel acting in behalf of the President, the distinguished ranking Republican on the committee and the chairman of the committee, all concluded that it could not be done and should not be done.

Now that, of course, presents opponents of the nomination with a serious problem. Those who support the nomination, as the distinguished Republican leader does, understandably and repeatedly asked that specific facts be stated to justify the conclusions of opponents while opponents are prohibited from stating such facts because the President controls the reports and has at least so far refused to permit disclosure of such facts.

There is no obvious or easy answer, and I agree completely with the distinguished Republican leader that we must do all we can to provide fairness in what is admittedly a very difficult and delicate situation.

But in fairness to all, it must be stated repeatedly and understood, that the circumstances in which we now find ourselves are those which I have described, and I know the distinguished Republican leader agrees with me on that. He is aware of these documents and has been present at many discussions that have been held.

I have spent much of my adult life in the system of justice. I have tried many cases, even presided over a few in my brief tenure as a Federal judge.

And I have been profoundly troubled by the difficulties which attend this process.

Our system of justice establishes specific rules and procedures for the introduction of evidence, for the evaluation of witnesses, for the consideration of evidence by the decisionmaker, whether it be the judge or jury.

There is no identical process here and we struggle to find a method by which we can accomplish our task in a manner that is fair to Senator Tower, fair to the President, and fair to those who are entrusted with this important decision.

I hope in the coming hours that we can deliberate further.

We will be happy, of course, to consider any request that the distinguished Republican leader chooses to make, and we will do so immediately and when made and during any further discussions.

I cannot speak for any other Senator, and I do not purport to do so. But I want to say that I have spent a great deal of time studying the record, attempting to determine what process I should use in reaching a decision, what standard I should apply and trying to determine the credibility to be given the information before us.

And I want to emphasize to the distinguished Republican leader that it is not just the FBI report. As he is well aware, there is a great deal of information in the committee records which is not included in the FBI report, which is directly relevant and which bears at least as much relevance as the FBI report on the question before us.

The issue extends not just to the FBI report. Indeed, it can validly be argued that it is the full record before the committee going beyond the FBI report that is itself critical to the decisionmaking process and which we also must struggle with in terms of how to reach a decision.

So I hope it is understood, and I believe it is, that we are all struggling to be fair in a very difficult situation. We all operate under some constraint, and we will attempt in the coming hours to improve the method by which this has occurred, to permit the fullest possible discussion and the greatest possible information for Senators to consider in making this judgment.

Mr. President, I took the occasion to ask the distinguished President pro tempore to permit me to interject these brief remarks because they bore directly on this question, and I wanted to now give him the opportunity. He had actually sought recognition before me and he was gracious enough to permit me to seek recognition and so I wanted to thank him very much for that.

Mr. DOLE. If I could just respond briefly, then I would be happy to yield the floor for whatever the Senator from West Virginia would like.

As I understand the ruling on each of the requests I made—it was based on a Senate rule, rule XXIX; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Republican leader is correct.

Mr. DOLE. And that is because, as you indicated, that this was transmitted by the White House, the report, maybe not necessarily that letter. But there was an agreement. So I do not quarrel with that.

I may not agree with the distinguished majority leader on whether it is easier for those on one side or the other with all these constraints. We think it is very difficult on the proponents. It seems to me that there ought to be some indication or at least some disposition or some presumption that the nominee would be supported.

But we know for a fact, having read the report, that somebody can refer to one instance—I guess I may be getting into trouble here—but there may be other instances that you cannot talk about. So someone can make up their mind based on one little phrase in that report, maybe from some anonymous source, maybe from somebody else, notwithstanding their long relationship with the nominee himself, and we are not permitted to ask the person, as we are in normal debate, what about other statements, whatever, in any report.

So I think we are both constrained, not just one side, I think both sides. And I think the chairman indicated that this morning in his statement.

Maybe there is a way to make portions of the report public. I think the one concern there that some have on each side would be whether or not it would compromise the Federal Bureau of Investigation in other investigations and reports on nominees. I understand it is transmitted by the President, it is confidential, it is subject to rule XXIX, that we can lift the injunction of secrecy by resolution. That is another thing we could do.

So I raised the question because, as I said, I probably have been guilty myself. I thought surely you could add up the number of witnesses and say, "Well, there were 350 people interviewed." But, apparently, that is not permitted. I thought maybe you could say, "Well, there are so many for and so many against." But even those things are, I think the Parliamentarian properly ruled, not permissible.

Mr. MITCHELL. If I could just interject. The Senator has raised two separate questions. The first one, and the one he has made I think most consistently in his comments, is the ability to engage in full debate and question the rationale of Senators reaching a judgment. That obviously could be cured by a closed session.

The second one, which is related but not identical, is whether or not that should occur in public. Is it somehow unfair to Senator Tower to have that kind of debate in a closed session?

So we ought to understand that there are really two different issues here. The issue with respect to debate by Senators, what led a Senator to reach a certain conclusion, that can be disposed of easily and quickly by simply having a closed session in which there could be that kind of full open debate. Does that in and of itself create another unfairness is really the question.

We are all aware of the truism that the solution to every human problem carries within it the seed of a new problem. And we have to think about that.

I think if that is the Senator's primary concern, then it seems to me that the solution to that is not very difficult to achieve.

Mr. DOLE. I would just add to that, it still does not solve that problem of some who have talked about perceptions. And here I sympathize with the media. If we have a closed session, they still have to rely on leaks. They have been doing pretty well. They have been getting about one a day.

But, again, they would have to rely on somebody to come out and say, "Well, we had a big debate on whatever." And I think, obviously, in a closed session, none of these rules would apply; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proceedings of a closed session are covered by an injunction of secrecy.

Mr. WARNER. Will the leader yield on a point of history that we once discussed?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Well, I just point out the discussion that the distinguished Republican leader and I had on this very point. History shows that the Senate did deal in closed session with nominations until it got to the point where the leaks were so ridiculous that it was unfair to the nominee.

Mr. DOLE. 1929.

Mr. WARNER. 1929. And that was the year in which the Senate abandoned the practice of the closed hearing.

Mr. DOLE. I said to the chairman a couple of days ago, when we started this debate, that we were going to have a couple of days here and everybody is going to be positive. I cannot guarantee anything, say, next Tuesday or Wednesday, but so far I think we have had a good debate.

The President of the United States is still convinced that this battle can be won. But he wants a vote. He told me that today. He wants a vote. And we want a vote. We want a favorable vote.

We are searching, as I assume the other side is searching, for some way to make certain that when it is all said and done, the institution is stronger. It is pretty strong right now. Nobody is trying to weaken it.

Some have asked me, "Why shouldn't he withdraw the nomination instead of weaken the institution?"

I do not think so. It seems to me we can take care of this institution. We can find innovative ways to make certain the nominee is properly dealt with, whoever it may be. And if there is a serious question, if we get into closed versus open session, then you have what the Senator from Virginia has raised of who is going to leak the first to the press; how is the public going to know what happened?

On our side, we think there has been so much leaked against Senator Tower that we need some way to get a lot of this out in the open. I do not think anything else bad about Senator Tower is in the report. It is all out there in the public domain. So we have to even up the score somehow. We want to do it the right way, as I am certain the majority leader does.

So we would be happy to discuss any thoughts that anybody may have on either side of the aisle. And there are a lot of fertile minds in this place. Sometimes they come up with a good idea.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is no limit to the ingenuity of lawyers, accountants, and legislators.

Mr. DOLE. That is right.

Mr. MITCHELL. Could I just make one comment to the distinguished Republican leader?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Republican leader raised a question of a vote. Let me say, I originally intended to bring this nomination to the floor on Wednesday of this week. At the request of the Republican leader, which was a wholly appropriate request, I delayed bringing it up until Thursday to permit time for Senators to review the report. The report had not been available as originally anticipated and, appropriately, the distinguished Republican leader requested delay until Thursday, and we agreed to do that.

My original intention was to bring it up on Wednesday of this week and vote this week. At that time, I thought the report would be available Monday—this was the preceding week—and we would then go to it 48 hours later. The report itself was not fully available in final form until Wednesday morning, although I understand that a copy was delivered to each Senator's office on the previous day, Tuesday. And, as I indicated, appropriately and understandably, the request was made to delay until Thursday, which we did.

It has been my hope when we started yesterday that we might vote today. I want to say to the distinguished Republican leader, I am prepared to proceed to a vote as soon as possible, as soon as you indicate to me that those who support the nominee have had the opportunity to express their views. On numerous occasions in the past 2 months, the President has asked me to expedite the nominations of all of his nominees and I have tried very hard to accommodate that, in consultation and cooperation with the distinguished Republican leader. So I have no quarrel or criticism with what has occurred up until now.

As I said, in terms of the procedure of handling it, the timing of handling it; that my original plan was to have the report ready Monday, bring it up Wednesday, vote on Thursday. The report was not ready until Wednesday, so the Republican leader could have actually asked that it be delayed until today. He then agreed to do it on Thursday. I had hoped we could complete this on 2 days of debate, Thursday and Friday. It is evident now that will not occur. We will come back in on Monday and, at least from my standpoint as majority leader, I am prepared to vote as soon as the Republican leader indicates that he would like to vote.

I just want to make clear, and I know you understand this, there is no desire and intention on our part to delay this. We want to proceed to give everybody full opportunity to say whatever they want, and as soon as that is done, then to proceed to a vote which I very much hope will be early next week.

Mr. DOLE. Will the majority leader yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, certainly.

Mr. DOLE. I think the leader is correct. We did not delay. In fact, we advanced it 1 day. I heard on the TV last night: Republicans delay the Tower nomination 1 day. The truth of the matter is the report was filed Tuesday night. There is a 48-hour waiting period in the rules. I did not decide it. We waived 1 day of that. We could have, as you said, properly, we could have waited until Friday.

We want to move the debate. That is not a problem. We also want to illuminate or advise or inform the American people about the strength of our nominee, John Tower.

No one in this country is better qualified to be Secretary of Defense. No one knows him better than George Bush, the President of the United States. No one has a greater right to have his nominee confirmed than the President of the United States who won the election last November and we have, with the great cooperation of the other side of the aisle, been able to confirm, I think, a dozen nominees.

Since we started the debate there has not been one quorum call. So I think it speaks well for Senators on both sides who want to debate the nomination. But I do not want to lose sight of my initial purpose.

I asked a series of questions. The Parliamentarian properly responded, based on rule XXIX. We are right back where we were. We may get into closed versus open—but now what I am suggesting, and I appreciate the majority leader's indication he will consider it, having John Tower stand right there, right in the well and let somebody who is undecided or somebody who has a question of John Tower ask John Tower. Let them see John Tower. Maybe they can ask him about force structure; ask about what he has in mind for reform or the Packard Commission. Anything they want. Let him come right here so we can all make up our minds, those who have not made up their minds. If we can do it by consent—if not maybe we can do it by motion.

It would seem to me that it is just an idea. I am certain there may be a lot of better ones floating around, but I would conclude by saying I do not know of any Senator on either side of the aisle who wants this debate to end with people having second thoughts about did we treat this guy fairly? And there are a lot of second thoughts out there right now. Liberals, conservatives, people who did not care 2 weeks ago are suddenly saying, what are all these rumors? One day they are up and the next day they are down. And who in this body has not been subjected to rumors? I have. The majority leader has. We all have, in one way or another.

So, John Tower ought to be given the same standard treatment that we give other nominees; no better, no worse. So far it has not been any better. We look forward to working with the majority and I look forward to working with Senators who still are undecided. This is an important issue for the President of the United States. I voted against one nominee in the Carter administration and I apologized to Griffin Bell later. I made a mistake.

Someone convinced me that he did not have a good record on civil rights. And, without checking carefully enough, I concluded, well, maybe they were right. It was hearsay. Somebody told me something. And I later regretted it and I told him so and I apologized to him. He was a decent, good, Attorney General and a fine man and did not deserve my "no" vote.

So I have learned a little from experience, that we better be pretty careful before we start casting "no" votes around, without the facts.

Obviously, as a Republican leader, I want John Tower confirmed. I cannot force it. But we can provide information. But not much because we cannot say anything except: I conclude after a thorough reading of the report—I cannot tell you how many pages was in it—that he ought to be confirmed or he should not be confirmed. What does that tell anybody? That your judgment is better than my judgment? Or that there are more Democrats here than Republicans? What does that tell the American people about John Tower? Or the kind of Secretary of Defense he would be?

Those of us who have worked with John Tower know he would not win any warm and cuddly title around here. He said that himself. He does not win many popularity contests, but he knows what he is talking about. I think that is the bottom line.

Before the debate is ended, in addition to the revolving door question, we want to put to rest some of the other things being floated around about he could not command a submarine and all these other things that are floating around as if they were fact.

We will refute all those arguments. We will try to do it in the right way at the right level, at a high level. But then sooner or later we have to come to grips with how do we get into the guts of the debate without going into a closed session. Maybe there is not any way and maybe that is what we should do. Maybe we can convince enough colleagues on either side who may be undecided, in a closed session. The ultimate goal is the confirmation of John Tower as Secretary of Defense. And I say again, I talked to the President a couple of hours ago and he said I want a vote.

I said you are going to get a vote, Mr. President.

I thank my colleagues for their patience and I look forward to debating this issue along with others of my colleagues on both sides next week.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHAFEE. I would like to follow-up a question to the Chair by the Republican leader.

Do I understand that we are not permitted to say, regarding a charge: for every charge against Senator Tower there were three, four rebuttals against that charge? Is that illegal? Improper?

Mr. DOLE. It is not allowed.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, and apparently previously rendered by a preceding Chair, the Senator would be precluded from revealing any of those disclosures.

Mr. CHAFEE. Well, I have to revise my remarks, then. Is the majority leader seeking the floor?

Mr. MITCHELL. No.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, yesterday we had a joint meeting of the Senate and House of Representatives which was held to observe the 200th anniversary of the first gathering of the Congress of the United States, in New York City in 1789. A series of excellent speeches were delivered by our leaders, culminating in a superb address by the able historian David McCullough. Through those eight different talks we heard wove a common theme—that the Congress is composed of human beings who are reflective of their varied constituencies. And as a group of human beings they are capable of noble and inspiring actions, and also they are capable of sometimes acting in a petty, meanspirited manner that reflects ill upon themselves and the institution of which they are a part.

Regrettably, Mr. President, in my judgment, we are currently behaving in the latter fashion, and I deeply believe in future days we will reflect on the handling of the Tower nomination and conclude that this was far from our finest hour; that as judgment is delivered on the actions of this 101st Congress, it will be noted that we have treated a fellow human being in a shabby manner.

Let me just briefly review the facts. John Tower served 24 years in this Senate, 20 of them on the Armed Services Committee. Every one of us acknowledges that due to the characteristics of this job, we spend innumerable hours together. Sometimes 24 or more hours. We take trips together. We see one another under convivial circumstances and under unpleasant and acrimonious circumstances. We learn to know one another—the strength and weaknesses. We know who maintains composure and his or her alertness, who fades and leaves decisions to others, who imbibes excessively and who seems as fresh and able at the end as at the beginning.

No one is thrown more open to scrutiny than those committee chairmen and the ranking members who handle complex and contentious legislation, such as the tax bill, such as an armed services defense authorization piece of legislation on this floor.

John Tower was never a contestant for the most popular man in the Senate. He would not even have finished in the middle, but he earned the respect of all in this body for his conduct, not only as a member and later chairman of the Armed Services Committee, but for his subsequent leading role on the strategic arms negotiating team and as a chairman of the Tower Board.

We are talking about a man, Mr. President, with long-time credentials. And these were in the major leagues. These were not in some minor league. During that time, 24 years here, 4 years subsequently, some of it as Tower Board chairman, some of it on the negotiating team, he has always been in a high visibility job. None of us have to rely on any FBI interviews with unnamed witnesses to tell us about John Tower's habits and personal conduct. All of us were here, and we all saw him and we know him. Not a single Senator has stated that he has ever seen John Tower in less than complete control of his facilities and conducting himself in a proper fashion.

The distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska just spoke and said he served on the Armed Services Committee with John Tower for many years; he had never seen John Tower in other than complete control of his facilities.

Despite this personal knowledge that we have and despite our judgments which were formed in the crucible of long association, many here are suddenly beguiled into a complete change of their opinion by a series of reports alleging that John Tower engaged in scandalous conduct here, there, or someplace else. Nearly every one of those allegations has come from unnamed individuals. In every single case, there have been rebuttals. Apparently, I am not permitted to say how many rebuttals, but all I can say is there were many rebuttals. If I go to jail for that, so be it.

Those individuals who did the rebutting were willing to give their names, and they were present the very same instance where the alleged improprieties were said to have occurred. Those individuals said flatly that John Tower's conduct was totally unlike that which was alleged and, indeed, his conduct was respectable in all aspects.

Indeed, anyone who gives a careful reading of the report and the rest of the documents up there reveals that some of those individuals levying the charges subsequently, under questioning from the FBI, substantially backed off from those allegations. They would submit something to the committee—a letter, an interview—and then it was followed up by an FBI interview and the people would reverse course, not 180 degrees all the time, but they would change those allegations.

In other instances, those making the charges were found to be highly dubious characters. Now, what is so incomprehensible to me is how these Senators, many of whom, as I say, have known John Tower intimately, can suddenly set aside what they personally know, what they have seen, what they know to be the weight of the evidence and latch on to testimony of unnamed individuals that in every case is categorically disputed by others present at the occasion referred to.

Opposition to this nomination would be far easier to understand if questions were raised as to Senator Tower's qualifications and his ability to handle the job as Secretary of Defense. But no one—no one—has expressed doubt about Senator Tower's expertise in the defense area.

I am going to quote from the majority view of the report on the Committee on Armed Services:

> Senator Tower has a substantial understanding of national security policy and international security affairs. His 20-year service as a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, including four years as chairman, his service as chief U.S. negotiator in the strategic arms reduction talks [START], and his chairmanship of the Tower Board have provided Senator Tower with a solid background in national and international security issues. His expertise was evident during the committee's hearings, during which Senator Tower was questioned on a wide range of national and international security policy issues.

That is what the majority report of the Armed Services Committee said. Many of our colleagues who have now announced the intention to vote against this nomination are on record many times over as praising Senator Tower's credentials and his effectiveness. Many of these Senators have said that Senator Tower would be a fine nominee for the Pentagon position for which he is nominated.

I do not intend today to refute all the various charges which have been made against Senator Tower because that has been done by previous speakers. But I would like to deal with two matters that have been raised.

The first, the misleading characterization of Senator Tower's earnings from his consulting job. Those misleading characterizations have contributed to the impression that somehow he is deeply beholden to his prior clients; $1 million in fees flashes all across our newspapers; $1 million is a lot of money to anybody, and it gives us all a jolt because it is so sizable.

What reports fail to tell us is that those moneys were paid over 2½ years, $300,000 of that $1 million never came from defense contractors; it came from an aerospace contract. It was not a defense contract. Finally, these were gross amounts. These were the amounts before expenses. These were not the net. This is not what Senator Tower pocketed, $700,000 from defense contractors. From this amount earned over 2½ years, he had to pay two professional staff, he had to pay four support staff, he had to pay rent and expenses for two offices—one of them in Washington and one in Dallas—and he had to cover his travel.

The dazzling figure of $1 million is used in such a way that it generates suspicion about Senator Tower's past actions, as well as about his objectivity in the future. In truth, his net income from those 2½ years of earnings was not much more than he was earning in this body and a good deal less than Washington lawyers earn.

Now, do we have any proof, any sincere doubts that Senator Tower disclosed either inside or classified information? We do not at all. We have none, nor do we have good reason to think that Senator Tower would be influenced by former clients while serving as Secretary of Defense.

We have to give some credit to the integrity that the man showed in this Chamber for the 24 years he was here. I do not know how we can just wash that aside based on some allegations that appear in the famous FBI report. I think to tell what a man is going to do in the future you have to look to see what his record has been.

Now, this is what the senior Senator from Texas, a Member of this body, had to say about John Tower. "John Tower is not a slave to the Pentagon or to anybody else. When he discovered that an Army attack helicopter was going to be way over budget, John Tower refused to support additional funding for that system. He was too much of a conservative to give a blank check from the U.S. Treasury even if that check purports to pay for defense improvements."

Next I would like to briefly discuss a charge which is practically a self-fulfilling prophecy, and that has been used around here. Listen to it. The allegation is that Senator Tower has been so savaged by these proceedings that if he were confirmed, he would not be able to function effectively as Secretary of Defense.

Now, if we follow this line of reasoning, any nominee would be forced to withdraw if we throw enough mud at him in the process around this place. Regardless of these charges and innuendos and rumors and perceptions, if John Tower is confirmed he will be able to fulfill his duties because he will not only have the authority that goes with being Secretary of Defense but, more importantly, he will speak as President Bush's representative in defense matters.

I have had some experience in the Pentagon. Let me just say that if there is one thing that the military does, when a decision is reached at the top, they fall in line behind it. And so whether John Tower is confirmed 70 to 30 or 51 to 47 or 51 to 49 or whatever it might be, when he goes into that Defense Department, those who are in that department will wheel into line behind him because that is what they do. And I have seen it personally over the years that I had the privilege to be there.

In addition, when he goes abroad to talk with the defense ministers of other nations, it will not be just John Tower that is talking. It is the Secretary of Defense of the United States of America who is speaking on behalf of the administration of this Nation and for the President of the United States.

Thus, I would say to my colleagues, give no credence to those who say he has been grievously wounded or that he should not be selected because the Armed Forces would prefer somebody else.

Mr. President, the hearings, the committee votes, the Senate debate on the nomination of John Tower has been an unhappy experience, it has been an unhappy experience for many and it certainly in my judgment has not reflected great credit on this Senate.

A distinguished American has had his name defiled on the front pages of our newspapers and on nightly television news broadcasts as a result of leaked charges and allegations that do not portray the other side, that have not shown the completely contradictory evidence that is there also in the record.

We apparently have succumbed to the level of stating that one becomes guilty not by the facts but by perception. We have rejected the standard that has always existed in the Senate of giving the benefit of the doubt to the President in Presidential Cabinet appointees, not in judges who serve for life but for Presidential Cabinet appointees who serve only at the pleasure of the President and certainly no longer than 8 years and frequently shorter.

We have said that anyone who bears a grudge or has an interesting story to tell can sully the reputation of a long serving and eminently qualified public servant, and that is what has happened in this case. Mr. President, I believe that is wrong for our country and I think it is wrong for one of our citizens who happens to have the name of John Tower.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. KENNEDY addressed the Chair.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The chair recognizes the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY].

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense has been an ordeal for the nominee, the President, the Armed Services Committee and the Senate as a whole.

On almost all occasions, the Senate defers to the President and gives its consent to his nominations for the Cabinet.

The Senate has already approved 14 of President Bush's Cabinet nominees—13 with unanimous votes in both committee and on the floor. This record is a tribute both to the outstanding selections that the President has made and to the bipartisan spirit in which the Senate has acted. It is also a full and adequate answer to the preposterous partisan charges swirling around this debate. No one in the Senate is seeking to undermine the President. No one in the Senate is playing politics with this issue. No one in the Senate is trying to run the Pentagon from Capitol Hill. What is happening here is as clear and as profound as the Constitution of the United States. The Senate has its own solemn constitutional responsibility on nominations, and Senator SAM NUNN, above all others, deserves the credit for insisting that we live up to that responsibility. On rare occasions such as the one before us, the Senate has an obligation to the country to say "no" to the President and ask him to choose again.

Few offices in our Government are more essential to our future and even to our very survival than the position of Secretary of Defense. The Secretary is second behind the President in the chain of command for U.S. military forces and nuclear weapons. He oversees the development of military strategy and national security policy. He also must manage a massive organization with a $300 billion budget and 3 million employees, including the members of our Armed Forces.

It is true that Senator Tower has background and experience in national security issues. But as these proceedings have gone on, more and more questions have been raised about his nomination. The questions include serious allegations about alcohol abuse and conflict of interest. And the questions are not answered satisfactorily—not at all—by the FBI report and the committee hearings.

Members of the Armed Services Committee were surprised to learn that Senator Tower had moved so quickly from chief U.S. negotiator in Geneva on strategic nuclear weapons to the role of an industry consultant on how the negotiations would affect the future of our nuclear weapons spending.

As a result of his position as chief negotiator, Senator Tower possessed extremely sensitive information on U.S. bargaining positions, possible fallback positions, and interagency deliberations as well as the specific weapon programs that would be affected by an arms control treaty.

Senator Tower did not avoid discussion of these subjects—subjects on which he possessed privileged information. Instead, he provided his consulting clients with advice of the probable outcomes of the negotiations and how they would affect their product lines.

This conduct reflects a disturbing insensitivity to the need to avoid the appearance of high officials misusing confidential information for private gain.

During the past 2½ years, Senator Tower received over a million dollars for his advice to at least six major defense corporations. As Secretary of Defense, he would inevitably have to make decisions that would affect the business of the same companies. Yet, he cannot recuse himself from actions involving all the firms and still manage the Pentagon effectively.

Perhaps, in spite of his recent financial ties to corporations that make the MX missile, the Midgetman missile, and other major components of our defense, Senator Tower could still make sound decisions about which systems should be reduced or eliminated to meet the budget targets for national defense.

Perhaps, in spite of the appearances of impropriety, Senator Tower could still provide the commitment and leadership necessary to restore integrity to a defense acquisition process that has been rocked by scandal.

Perhaps, in spite of his extraordinarily lucrative financial ties to the country's largest defense contractors, Senator Tower could still bring an open mind to the awesome decisions that lie ahead on our national defense.

But America should not be forced to take this chance.

The Pentagon has been shaken in the past year by serious allegations of fraud—allegations that go to the core of the competitive procurement process. Three years ago, the Packard commission concluded that the entire defense acquisition process is fundamentally flawed.

It is essential that the next Secretary of Defense have the unquestioned ability and commitment to lead the Pentagon out of the procurement wilderness and restore public confidence in the integrity of our national security.

Senator Tower has been a colleague. Many in this body respect his knowledge and service. But I am convinced that a majority of this body can and will conclude that as to Secretary of Defense the job is wrong for him—and he is wrong for the job.

I yield the floor.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Would the Senator care to inquire as to the absence of a quorum?

Mr. KENNEDY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BINGAMAN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, as I said in my remarks yesterday and have said many times, the leaks of confidential information or material from the FBI report over the past week have been unfortunate. These leaks are unfair to the nominee, to other individuals, and those of us who feel strongly about this nomination but who have also respected the confidentiality of the FBI report.

There was a story in the press on Wednesday describing allegations by a Sergeant Jackson about Senator Tower's behavior, alleged behavior, at Bergstrom Air Force Base. I deplored that leak yesterday and I again believe it very unfortunate.

Sergeant Jackson spoke both to the FBI and the committee and a memorandum related to this allegation is in S-407. The memorandum has been updated to reflect the information provided in the last day by the Air Force that was put in the RECORD last night in the form of a letter from the general counsel of the Air Force.

In addition to that letter which is in the public record, there is additional information in S-407 that has been developed by committee staff. I urge my colleagues who have read the original memo to read the supplemental information in room S-407.

I also want to state that this particular incident was not a significant factor in my own thoughts on this nomination. In my view it was not a significant factor in the committee's deliberation. This was just one item which was cumulative of other information about Senator Tower's excessive drinking in 1970's, a point which both the White House and the nominee now acknowledge.

So to me, as I viewed it, if the information was taken to be totally accurate, and I do not make that case, it was cumulative to not only information that was already in the FBI report, but also cumulative to admissions that have already been made.

But I want to make this absolutely clear. I think any Senator who read the original memorandum should read the supplementary material, including the letter that was put in the RECORD yesterday by Senator COHEN, and also including an additional review of the records of Sgt. Malcolm R. Jackson, Jr., which has been prepared by the Air Force Military Personnel Center.

I ask unanimous consent that this document now be printed in the RECORD; and, so all of these items can be read together, that the Air Force general counsel letter placed in the RECORD last evening by Senator COHEN also be placed in the RECORD immediately prior to the document prepared by the Air Force Military Personnel Center.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE,
Washington, DC, March 2, 1989.

Mr. PATRICK A. TUCKER,
Minority Counsel, Senate Armed Services Committee, Senate Russell Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. TUCKER: This is in response to your request of this morning for information regarding retired Air Force Technical Sergeant Robert ("Bob") Jackson.

Air Force records, as read to me telephonically this afternoon, reveal the following:

One "Bob" Jackson, DOB 6 May 1934, was assigned to Bergstrom Air Force Base from February 1976 until April 1978.

Sergeant Jackson's first duty day at Bergstrom was 21 February 1976. His last duty day was 16 March 1977. On 21 March 1977 Sergeant Jackson was referred to Wilfred Hall Medical Center for medical supervision and subsequently was placed on the Temporary Disability Retired List following medical and psychological evaluation.

The Physical Evaluation Board which evaluated Sergeant Jackson concluded, inter alia, that Sergeant Jackson exhibited symptoms of a mixed personality disorder with anti-social themes and hysterical features. Air Force records indicate that following 21 March 1977 Sergeant Jackson was unable to perform his duties as an information specialist. He was retired from the Air Force at the grade of E-6 on 19 April 1978.

Sincerely,

ANNE N. FOREMAN,
General Counsel.

DEPARTMENT OF THE AIR FORCE, HEADQUARTERS, AIR FORCE MILITARY PERSONNEL CENTER,
Randolph Air Force Base, TX, March 3, 1989.

Subject: Review of Records—TSgt (Ret) Malcolm R. Jackson, Jr.
To SAF/LLL (Col Moran).

1. This responds to your direction that we review the Personnel and Medical Records of TSgt (Ret) Malcolm R. Jackson, Jr.

2. Malcolm R. (changed to Bob pursuant to a 29 Mar 77 court order) Jackson, Jr., originally enlisted in the Air Force on 9 Oct 50. He was honorably discharged on 15 Oct 53, after serving in Korea and North Africa. Following a break in service, he reenlisted in the Air Force on 2 Nov 61. Thereafter, he served variously as a Weapons Control Systems Mechanic, an Intelligence Operations Specialist, and finally as an Information Office Supervisor. After reenlisting in 1961, he served on active duty continuously (including a year in Vietnam, 70-71) until his retirement in 1978.

3. TSgt Jackson's only operational assignment in the Information career field occurred upon his assignment to the Office of Information, 67th Tactical Reconnaissance Wing, Bergstrom AFB, Texas, on 21 Feb 76. He received this assignment upon his return from a tour of duty at Rhein Main AB, Germany. At Bergstrom AFB, he was NCOIC, Office of Information, with responsibility for supervising five enlisted members of the Information Office staff. He also administered the Community Relations and Public Affairs activities as Chief of that division. Among other things, he was responsible for supervising the base tour program and publicizing special events. TSgt Jackson received his only APR in the information career field on 22 Feb 77, for the period 21 Feb 76-10 Jan 77. Although it was generally a good report, both the rater and the reviewer marked him down one block in the area of "Behavior." In addition, the rater made the following comment under the heading Recommended Improvements:

TSgt Jackson's high degree of dedication to his own ideals and those of the Air Force has, on occasion, been interpreted as impatience with superiors and their prerogatives. Without meaning to be disrespectful, TSgt Jackson's idealism can interefere with communicating his first concern, which has always been the effective and fair management of people.

The performance report before that one, while complementing him for the tenacity he displayed indicating a real affinity for the social actions career field, also noted that he was "initially somewhat overzealous in his attempts to insure results." TSgt Jackson's lower rating for "Behavior" on his APR for the period he was an Information Office Supervisor reflects a pattern of lowered ratings for "Bearing and Behavior" on his performance reports (nine of eleven APRs extending back to 1970 contain "mark-downs" in that area, although most were only marked him down one block from the highest possible rating).

4. TSgt Jackson had suffered a long history of knee problems before arriving at Bergstrom AFB. In Dec 76, he was initially seen at the Wilford Hall Orthopedic Clinic, WHMC, San Antonio, Texas. After subsequently being evaluated there a number of times, on 24 Mar 77 he entered the hospital for reconstructive surgery on his right knee. The operation was delayed, but was finally performed on 22 Apr 77. During the follow-up to that surgery, TSgt Jackson began to complain of pain in his left knee. He stated he didn't think he was able to perform duty requirements because of his bilateral knee problems. (As a matter of fact, his last full duty day at Bergstrom AFB was 16 Mar 77.) He was admitted to WHMC on 20 Sep 77 for evaluation and possible Medical Evaluation Board (MEB) action. Preliminary to the MEB, on 26 Jan 78 a Narrative Summary was accomplished at WHMC by Major (Dr.) Bernard F. Morrey. The Narrative Summary notes that when TSgt Jackson first entered the hospital in March 77 for knee surgery, he was wearing a beard and claimed he was in the USN. When checking revealed he was not in the Navy, he shaved his beard. The Narrative Summary also points out that in 1963, TSgt Jackson had been admitted to the San Diego Naval Hospital for psychiatric evaluation. In that regard, the Narrative Summary goes on to state:

"He admitted that in Sep 77 WHMC admission, he was admitted because he struck an officer; however, SF 93 states that it was because of an overdose of pills. The 1963 Narrative Summary at the Naval facility indicates he presented to the Dispensary complaining of a temperature which was recorded at 103°; however, it was suspected that he switched thermometers, and when accused of this, the broken thermometer was found in the patient's pocket. He became agitated at this and this eventuated in a hospitalization for psychiatric evaluation. The patient was in the hospital for 18 days, being dismissed with the diagonsis of acute maladjustment situation. He was fit for duty. On 1969, the patient was evaluated by a psychiatrist for reasons which are not clear on the chart. The chart indicated that information had come to the attention of his CO, which necessitated evaluation. On evaluation, the patient was considered to have no psychiatric diagnosis."

5. The 26 Jan 78 Narrative Summary also notes that a Staff Psychiatrist, Dr. Eugene Kircher, evaluated TSgt Jackson at WHMC. Dr. Kircher stated there was:

". . . no strong evidence of functional component for the patient's knee pain. It was concluded that he exhibited some eccentric behavior and this was assessed as being consistent with mixed personality disorder with features of antisocial and hysterical themes. The patient had a tendency to overreact with a low frustration tolerance. It was recommended he have an S1 profile."

We are advised by the medical member of the Formal Physical Evaluation Board (a psychiatrist) that an "S1" profile reflects that an individual either has a mild or no personality disorder with the continuum going to "S4" which would reflect the most severe disorder. The final diagnosis reached by the medical officer who wrote the 26 Jan 78 Narrative Summary included knee impairment, degenerative arthritis, several other purely physical problems and "Personality trait disorder." TSgt Jackson was evaluated by Major (Dr.) Morrey as not qualified for worldwide duty and not retainable. Presentation of the case to a MEB was recommended.

6. TSgt Jackson's MEB convened on 14 Feb 78 at WHMC. One of the three members included a psychiatrist, Lt. Col. G. Hulse Wagner. The MEB established six diagnoses, all but one of which were physical in nature. The sixth was "Mixed personality disorder; antisocial themes and hysterical features." The MEB recommended referral of the case to the Physcial Evaluation Board (PEB). That recommendation was approved on 15 Feb 78.

7. On 23 Feb 78, the Informal PEB considered TSgt Jackson's case. The diagnosis of the Informal PEB was as follows:

"Status post multiple right knee reconstruction surgery; early degenerative arthritis; early degenerative arthritis left knee with chondromaclacia patella and recurrent effusion; functional bowel syndrome mild; prostatosis, mild, not requiring treatment; high frequency hearing loss; mixed personality disorder, antisocial themes and hysterical features. Not unfitting singly or in the aggregate."

The Informal PEB concluded, based on the foregoing diagnosis, that TSgt Jackson was not unfit because of physical disability, and recommended that he be returned to duty. The member nonconcurred, and requested his case be referred to the Formal PEB.

8. At the Formal PEB hearing held on 13 Mar 78, the testimony focused primarily on TSgt Jackson's physical problems—particularly the condition of his knees. There was, however, the following testimony regarding his psychiatric consult:

President: How did you get along with Dr. Kircher?

"Evaluee: Who?

"President: Dr. Kircher, the psychiatrist?

"Evaluee: Oh, not well.

"President: Did you see his consult?

"Evaluee: No, sir. I saw the narrative summary and saw what—

"President: He indicated; the patient was totally ignorant of the claim of the Staff Orthopods in regard to how often he changes his story, not only in regard to the pain and limitations he is experiencing from his knees, but the load of other complaints that he has all of a sudden come up with in preparation for this Medical Evaluation Board. You haven't seen that?

"Evaluee: No, sir.

"President: Where do you think he got that idea? How many yes's did you have checked on the Report of Medical History that they, you know, use with the physicals?

"Evaluee: Oh, a great host.

"President: Do you think maybe that's where he got the idea that you had a load of other medical complaints?

"Evaluee: Well, it could well be, yes, sir. They ask, you know, there are questions on there and—I ask—

"President: If you had any doubts you check yes?

"Evaluee: Yes, sir."

At the conclusion of the Formal PEB hearing, the Board found him physically unfit for worldwide service, and recommended temporary retirement with a compensable rating of 40 percent (30 percent due to the condition of his knees and 10 percent because of tinnitus—a persistent ringing in his ears. Among the other diagnosis was again included "Mixed Personality Disorder," but it was considered by the board as not ratable. Following review by the Physical Review Council (PRC) on 21 Mar 78, TSgt Jackson was placed by SecAF on the Temporary Disability Retired List (TDRL) on 20 Apr 78, with a 40 percent disability rating. He entered the TDRL with 19 years, 5 months and 25 days of active service for retirement. His case was reviewed by the PRC on 14 Jun 79. He was again rated at 40 percent, but this time there was no reference to "personaltiy disorder" in the diagnosis. TSgt Jackson was removed from the TDRL and placed on permanent retired status, effective 18 Jul 79.

SUMMARY

9. According to the Medical Member of the Formal PEB, review of available medical records fails to substantiate the presence of any neurosis or psychosis. There is evidence of a personality disorder marked by uncooperative behavior. Reliability may be a problem. My review of the member's Personnel Records reflects an average NCO who was generally well thought of, but who also had a tendency to be a little too aggressive and somewhat overly idealistic. He also seems to have consistently fallen short in the area of bearing and behavior, in the judgment of his supervisors.

COMMENTS OF REPORTING OFFICIAL

Facts and Specific Achievements: Technical Sergeant Jackson, although new to the information career field, actively applied innovative solutions to the most critical problem areas, began an on-the-job training program, and bolstered morale with his sincere approach to people and their problems. His individual efforts resulted in more effective use of the Information Office staff, an increase in the amount of local news and photographs in the base newspaper, and better relationships with local media representatives. He was the only information specialist in the command to win the Tactical Air Command Photojournalist of the Year award. Strengths: TSgt Jackson's most outstanding asset is his devotion to the Air Force and it's people. His aggressive pursuit of efficiency is always tempered with a sincere concern for the welfare of those he is responsible to and for. Recommended improvements: TSgt Jackson's high degree of dedication to his own ideals and those of the Air Force has, on occassion, been interpreted as impatience with superiors and their prerogatives. Without meaning to be disrespectful, TSgt Jackson's idealism can interfere with communicating his first concern, which has always been the effective and fair management of people. Other Comments: TSgt Jackson's membership on the Black Heritage Week committee is just one of the examples of his support of equal opportunity programs. He is an outstanding supervisor, a fair and concerned leader, and an asset to this or any organization. He should be given every opportunity to serve in a leadership or management position.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, by reading this more detailed record, I think anyone interested in this subject would be able to get a more complete view.

I again repeat that I do not believe this particular incident, that is reflected in the memo in S-407, is not and was not a significant part of this overall matter. I think Senator COHEN made that clear in the paper this morning. I have not had a chance to talk to him about it, but he stated, quoting him directly, "It's my understanding that no serious consideration was given to the allegation for lack of credible, corroborating evidence." I went on to say in the paper this morning:

This [Jackson's account] was merely one item which was cumulative of other information about Sen. Tower's excessive drinking in the 1970s, which both the White House and the nominee have now acknowledged. Therefore, this item was not a significant factor in my own thoughts or, I believe, in the committee's deliberations.

So I want to take all of this in context. But again I urge any Members who felt that this was a factor in their own deliberations to take a look at this information as well as the information that is now in S-407.

I believe, Mr. President, by unanimous consent this document, which I will call "Review of Records," has now been admitted in the record, is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. NUNN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, this document, entitled "Review of Records" indicates that Technician Sergeant Jackson had a history of personality disorders, but that was not the primary basis for his medical retirement from the Department of the Air Force; that is the history of personality disorder.

This information adds to the information about Technician Sergeant Jackson's psychiatric history, which was entered into the record yesterday. At the same time, this "Review of Records" also establishes that Technician Sergeant Jackson's last duty day at Bergstrom Air Force Base was March 16, 1977, some several months before the date when he claimed to have observed Senator Tower at the base as part of his, Technician Sergeant Jackson's, officials duties.

I also note that a former commander of the 12th Air Force, headquarters at Bergstrom Air Force Base, who was in that position from June 1975 through June 1978, recalls that when Senator Tower was visiting Bergstrom once during that period, and that one visit was on the first Saturday of August 1975, both the then wing commander and the vice wing commander recall that single visit. That visit would have been some 7 months before Technician Sergeant Jackson was assigned to Bergstrom as established by this document entitled "Review of Records."

This document, entitled "Review of Records" was received at the Armed Services Committee, being transmitted from the Department of the Air Force around noon today and shortly thereafter was made available to both the majority and minority staffs.

Mr. President, I would also like to have the record reflect that I did not handle this issue of this debate directly and that I am making these remarks based on representations made to me by Mr. Tucker, the minority staff director and counsel.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, the Senate, in accordance with its constitutional responsibility to provide "advice and consent" on Presidential appointments, has been asked to consider the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

This process is not about protecting the President's prerogative to name who he wants to his Cabinet.

It is not a win-lose battle between the two political parties to see who can gain the upper hand at the start of a new administration.

This process is about choosing the best possible person to head the Pentagon at a time when fiscal responsibility and cost effectiveness must be the watchwords of our armed services.

Unfortunately, for the President who nominated him, the Senate that must reject this nomination, and the American people who must endure this public ordeal, John Tower is not that person.

In all but the rarest of circumstances, it has been the tradition of the Senate to grant the President the right to name his own Cabinet.

The Senate has followed that tradition by approving, unanimously in all but one instance, 14 previous Bush Cabinet nominees.

I might add, however, that given the recent history of a number of Presidential appointees who have either failed to discharage their duties or exited under an ethical cloud, perhaps the Senate should break the rubberstamp mold more often. If the Senate had been more vigilant in exercising its advice and consent role, maybe some of these instances could have been avoided. Indeed, we ought to demand men and women who are the most qualified, not just the least objectionable, to fill high executive posts.

The position of Secretary of Defense, sworn to uphold the constitutional responsibility to "provide for the common defense," is a particularly sensitive and crucial post.

And the words and deeds of John Tower, taken together, present a portrait of a person particularly unfit for this position. I reserved judgment until after reading the FBI reports, but the portrait they offer is devastating. If the American people could see these reports they would be astounded that John Tower was nominated in the first place.

The FBI reports document numerous instances of excessive drinking and philandering, questionable business practices and ties to the defense industry. What is significant, however, are the questions these incidents raise about Senator Tower's judgment, integrity, and fitness to manage the defense of our Nation.

Senator Tower has admitted to a drinking problem in his past, which he says ended in the last decade. And I must say this is one of the reasons I refused to make up my mind on this nomination until after reading the FBI reports.

Alcoholism is a disease that can be overcome. If John Tower has gotten over the drinking problem he clearly had in the 1970's, then I can't hold that against him. But the record indicates he hasn't. And his testimony is riddled with inconsistencies. There are also references in the record in which Senator Tower engaged in questionable and offensive behavior toward female members of the Armed Forces.

One of the most demeaning aspects of this debate have been the suggestions by some that actions of John Tower are nothing out of the ordinary for Members of Congress. That is not true. Of course, Congress has its share of saints and sinners, it is a cross section of the American people. But just like the public it represents, the vast majority of Congress do not drink to excess or run around on their spouses.

So to say that John Tower is just like everyone else, to say he's just doing what everyone else is doing is just not true. Congress has a higher standard than that and I know the American people have a higher standard than that.

The charges being brought against John Tower are not partisan—they were not first brought up by Democrats.

I do not appreciate being accused of partisanship. I have supported all of the President's nominees, including Jack Kemp and Ed Derwinski, both former Congressmen with whom I have had numerous policy differences over the years. But I had no question about voting to confirm them. I do not even know John Tower personally. We have never clashed over a policy difference. So, obviously my disagreement is not partisan.

Concerns with the Tower record are bipartisan, and in fact were first aired by transition advisers to President Bush last November and December. If any body ought to be upset right now, it ought to be George Bush. The President made his decision after seeing only the first volume of the FBI reports. It appears that Sentor Tower was not up front with President Bush about all the information he knew would come out in the complete FBI investigation.

So if this nomination has now become a partisan issue, it is because a few have chosen to make it so.

Tower is a stark example of the revovling door between the regulators and the regulated in the defense industry that many Republican Senators, most notably my distinguished colleague from Iowa, Senator GRASSLEY, have long sought to eliminate.

In 1985, after leaving the Senate and his post as Armed Services Chairman, John Tower headed up the U.S. arms control negotiating team in Geneva. After serving in this position for 13 months, Senator Tower entered into consulting arrangements with defense contractors from mid-1986 until December 1988. Over the course of these 2½ years, he received $750,000 from various defense contractors.

In addition, he received another $265,000 from British Areospace for what he claimed were nondefense activities in 1987. However, in his divorce deposition taken in June 1987, he stated that he gave British Aerospace advice on selling certain systems to the Defense Department.

According to Senator Tower's own testimony, he advised his defense contractor clients on the "implications of INF and other arms control negotiations on * * * future product development," along with the "probable outcomes" of the arms control talks. Obviously, defense contractors have far more than a passing interest in such matters.

Indeed, Senator Tower has promised not to pass back through the revolving door once his term as Secretary of Defense ended.

Unfortunately, we have heard this promise before. When John Tower left the Senate 5 years ago, he said: "One thing I will not be is a lobbyist. You can put that in your pipe and smoke it." In fact, John Tower broke that promise and lobbied Congress on behalf of the C-FIN, an aerial navigation program made by LTV.

Five years and $1 million in fees from defense contractors later, he made the promise on December 17, 1988 that he would "recuse—himself—from contracts or decisions affecting clients—he has—represented as a consultant." If that's the case, Senator Tower will effectively not be able to serve as Defense Secretary. He's going to be recusing himself practically every other minute. His deputies will be making all the crucial decisions.

Given his past associations, Senator Tower could not participate in decisions regarding the B-1 bomber, the B-2 Stealth bomber, the MX missile, the Midgetman missile, advanced cruise missiles, the advanced tactical fighter, the V-22 Osprey, or the Tactic rainbow surface-to-ground missile. And if we include parts of weapons systems built by contractors Tower advised, he would have to recuse himself from decisions regarding the Copperhead missiles, the F-111, the Trident submarine, the M-1 tank, three different Army helicopters, plus the space shuttle and the line of Titan missiles that are essential to our space lift capability, plus the strategic defense initiative.

Senator Tower has since acknowledged that to recuse himself from all contracts he had any involvement with would paralyze Pentagon decisionmaking. And on January 25, he backtracked on his original pledge and said he would only take no role in decisions on suspension or debarment from Government defense work of any contractors who were his clients.

As the Army Times noted in a recent editorial, "No one has claimed Tower acted illegally * * * but the speed and greed with which Tower spun through the revolving door is appalling."

It is no coincidence that the Army, Navy and Air Force Times plus the respected Defense News have all opposed Senator Tower's nomination. These publications can see that with Senator Tower as Defense Secretary a shadow of public mistrust and suspicion will be cast over the uniformed services.

Even if Senator Tower has in fact committed no illegalities, his conduct raises serious ethical questions and the perception of wrong-doing. If indeed, this nominee is the victim of perceptions, these perceptions are a result of his own poor judgment.

As he himself stated before the Armed Services Committee, "we do have to be concerned about public perceptions because I think the essence of what is required for democracy to succeed is * * * popular confidence in public institutions." The perception, and it closely mirrors the reality, is that the Pentagon is in the hip pocket of the defense industry, that it is rampant with wasteful spending and fraud and that it is sorely in need for reform.

These are problems, that as chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Senator Tower helped to create by presiding over the most massive peacetime military buildup in U.S. history. More significantly, these are problems whose solution require a credibility and reputation for independence from the defense industry that Senator Tower surely lacks.

As Armed Services Chairman, Senator Tower effectively squelched any attempt to reform Pentagon procurement procedures. Not until he left in 1985 did Congress succeed in passing any reform measures. There is no reason to believe this antireform nominee will become the reformer the Pentagon and the Nation now demand.

Over the next 5 years, the Pentagon will be forced to reduce defense spending by aminimum of $300 billion, assuming optimistic Bush administration economic forecasts hold up. Decisions will need to be made about the composition of our force structure, over whether to put limited resources into the MX or the Midgetman missiles, over whether to fund the B-2 Stealth bomber, over what to do with SDI.

Can we expect the person who championed the birth of many of these weapons systems to now make the hard choices that may mean cutting or eliminating some of these weapons? Will Senator Tower be guided by sound defense considerations or past connections to the weapons makers? On the basis of his record, I question whether Senator Tower can exercise the judgment and wisdom necessary to make these hard choices.

Ultimately, our Nation's ability to mount a strong defense depends upon the support and the trust of the American people. Far from mustering support behind the Pentagon at a time it is under attack, Senator Tower if approved to the position of Defense Secretary, would only further weaken the public trust that is so crucial to effectively carrying out the Pentagon's mission.

In the final analysis, John Tower lacks the critical judgment that the next Secretary of Defense must have to face these great challenges. To reject a Presidential Cabinet nominee is an action the Senate should only undertake in the rarest of circumstances. Yet this is clearly what this Senate must do to ensure a strong national defense and a strong America. I urge my colleagues to reject the nomination of John Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

S. 505. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to provide that remarriage of the surviving spouse of a veteran after age 55 shall not result in termination of dependency and indemnity compensation; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

SURVIVING SPOUSES OF MILITARY PERSONNEL

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, today I introduce legislation to correct an inequity which affects surviving spouses of military pesonnel. Passage of this bill will allow them to remarry at age 55 or older and still retain benefits provided by the Veterans' Administration.

The Dependency and Indemnity Compensation [DIC] Program, administered by the Veterans' Administration, provides monthly benefits to the surviving spouses of those who died in the service of our country, or who died as a result of military service. Under current law, DIC benefits terminate when a surviving spouse remarries.

Public Law 99-661, the National Defense Authorization Act of 1987, provided that military surviving spouses should receive the same considerations as civil service surviving spouses who remarry. As a result, the age at which survivors could remarry without losing their survivor benefit plan annuity, administered by the Department of Defense, was lowered from 60 to 55. My legislation would allow these military surviving spouses to retain their DIC benefits as well.

Mr. President, it is my understanding that this proposal has the support of the Retired Officers Association, the Fleet Reserve Association, the National Association of Uniformed Services, the Air Force Association, the Naval Enlisted Reserve Association, the National Military Family Association, the Naval Reserve Association, the U.S. Warrant Officers, and the Coast Guard CPO Association. I invite my colleagues to join with me in this effort, and I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 505

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 103(d) of the title 38, United States Code, is amended by adding the following new paragraph after paragraph (3):

"(4) The remarriage after age 55 of a surviving spouse of a veteran shall not bar payment of benefits under section 411 of this title.".

By Mr. LAUTENBERG (for himself and Mr. MOYNIHAN):

S. 506. A bill to authorize the Corps of Engineers to collect and remove all floating material wherever it is collecting and removing from New York Harbor debris which is an obstruction to navigation; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

COLLECTION AND REMOVAL OF FLOATING MATERIAL

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, today, Senator MOYNIHAN, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Water Resources, Transportation and Infrastructure, is joining me in introducing legislation designed to help keep garbage off our States' beaches. Our legislation would direct the Army Corps of Engineers to use its existing program to remove floating driftwood in New York Harbor to assist in the cleanup of garbage in the harbor which is winding up on New Jersey and New York beaches.

Two summers ago, beaches along the New Jersey shore were closed because garbage slicks which contained hospital wastes and syringes washed up on the beaches. Last year, garbage washed up on New York beaches and medical wastes were found on beaches from New Jersey to Massachusetts. This garbage and medical waste adversely affects our important tourist industry, an $8 billion industry in New Jersey, and fish and wildlife resources, and ruins summer vacations. Estimates of loss to the New Jersey economy from last summer's pollution incidents range up to $1 billion. The number of people who visited the New Jersey shore dropped from 8.6 million in 1987 to 6.7 million in 1988.

There are numerous sources for the garbage which affect our beaches. According to EPA, one source is the garbage now in New York Harbor which is refloated during storm events through the harbor into ocean waters where it can be washed onto the shore. If this garbage were collected before it washed out into the ocean, we could reduce the amount of garbage which can affect our beaches.

The Corps of Engineers currently operates a program to remove floating drift wood in New York Harbor. Corps' boats operating in the Harbor use nets to collect pieces of driftwood which adversely effects navigation in the harbor.

These nets are not appropriate to capture smaller objects such as garbage. Smaller mesh nets could be used to collect garbage as well as driftwood floating in the harbor. In September, 1987 the corps made temporary nets to capture garbage found in slicks in the ocean prior to the last garbage washup. EPA counts on using the corps to act in an emergency.

Rather than wait for the emergency, it is imperative that the corps act now to stop the problem before it occurs. This can be done by the corps making the small investment necessary for nets which are appropriate to capture garbage as well as driftwood in the harbor. This involves a minimal cost, roughly $6,000-$7,000 per net.

Last May, I wrote to the Assistant Secretary of the Army urging him to use existing funds for this effort. Unfortunately, the Assistant Secretary responded not with action but with excuses, including a lack of authority, for failing to act. I ask unanimous consent that my letter and the response by the Assistant Secretary of the Army be included in the RECORD immediately following my statement.

The legislation we are introducing today will address the recalcitrance of the Department of the Army. It directs the Secretary of the Army to collect and remove all floating material whenever the Secretary is collecting and removing floating logs. It also authorizes such sums as may be necessary to cover the minimal costs of buying new sets and implementing this new responsibility.

I am confident that the corps will be able to work with EPA to identify any additional practices which are necessary to properly handle and dispose of the garbage. I also believe that the corps will be able to work out arrangements with New York and New Jersey for the proper disposal of the garbage.

Coastal tourism is one of New Jersey's most important industries. It, along with the well being of beach goers, is threatened by the continuing garbage washups. The investment that would be necessary to use the corps' existing program to help protect the beaches pales in comparison to the threat posed by garbage washups.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation and I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this legislation be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 506

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1.—COLLECTION OF FLOATABLES.—That the New York harbor collection and removal of drift project is further modified to direct the Secretary of the Army to collect and remove all floating material whenever the Secretary is collecting and removing debris which is an obstruction to navigation.

SEC. 2.—AUTHORIZATION.—There are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of the Army such sums as may be necessary to carry out this Act.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, DC, May 23, 1988.

Mr. ROBERT W. PAGE,
Assistant Secretary for Civil Works, Department of the Army, the Pentagon, Washington, DC.

DEAR. MR. PAGE: I am writing to request that the Corps of Engineers' consider expanding its existing program to remove floating drift wood in New York harbor to also include the cleanup of garbage in the Harbor.

Last summer, beaches along the New Jersey shore were closed because garbage slicks which contained hospital wastes and syringes washed up on the beaches. This past weekend, garbage again washed up on New Jersey beaches in Ocean County.

There are numerous sources for the garbage which affect our beaches. According to EPA, one source is garbage floating in the New York harbor which later washes ashore on New Jersey beaches. If this garbage were collected before it washed out into the ocean, we could significantly reduce the amount of garbage affecting our beaches.

The Corps of Engineers currently operates a program to remove floating drift wood in New York Harbor. Corps' boats operating in the Harbor use nets to collect pieces of drift wood which adversely affects navigation in the Harbor.

I understand that the existing nets are not appropriate to capture smaller objects such as garbage. Nets with a smaller mesh size, however, could be used to collect garbage as well as drift wood floating in the Harbor. Last September, the Corps made temporary nets to capture garbage found in slicks in the ocean prior to the last garbage washup. EPA is counting on using the Corps again this summer to act in an emergency.

Rather than wait for the emergency, I believe that the Corps should act now to try and stop the problem before it occurs. This can be done by the Corps making the small investment necessary for nets which are appropriate to capture garbage as well as drift wood in the Harbor.

I want to know whether the Corps can acquire the appropriate nets and act now to clean up garbage floating in the Harbor. I am requesting a meeting with you at your earliest convenience to discuss this matter further.

Coastal tourism is a billion dollar industry in New Jersey. This industry, along with the physical well-being of beach goers, is threatened by the continuing garbage wash-ups. The investment that would be necessary to use your existing program to help protect the beaches pales in comparison to the threat posed by garbage washups. I urge you to look favorably on using your existing program to remove floating drift wood to assist in preventing garbage from affecting our beaches.

I look forward to meeting with you and to working together in doing all we can to prevent further garbage washups along New Jersey's beaches.

Sincerely,

FRANK R. LAUTENBERG.

DEPARTMENT OF THE ARMY,
Washington, DC, August 17, 1988.

Hon. FRANK R. LAUTENBERG,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR LAUTENBERG: Thank you for your May 23, 1988, letter requesting that the Army Corps of Engineers consider expanding its existing program for drift removal in New York Harbor to include garbage cleanup in the harbor. Your concern for the impact of garbage washing up on New Jersey beaches certainly is understandable. Garbage washups along the area's beaches during recent weeks emphasize the continuing problem you are trying to solve. I certainly would be glad to meet with you to discuss this matter, but for reasons given below, I believe that the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) should have the lead on any actions to address the garbage problem.

The Corps of Engineers does not have the authority to collect any material in New York Harbor unless it poses a threat to navigation. At the Federal level, the EPA has the jurisdiction and responsibiity to address the floating garbage problem, since the concern here is the pollution of the harbor, ocean, and adjacent land areas. A fact sheet more fully describing the current situation regarding cleanup activities in the harbor is enclosed for your information.

Although I will defer to the EPA for details, I understand that it has prepared a plan to prevent a repeat of garbage washups consisting primarily of a cooperative effort between EPA and agencies of the States of New York and New Jersey. This effort would include monitoring the waters of the harbor with boats and helicopters and requiring responsible sources of the garbage to collect it. In addition, I understand that the city of New York has obtained additional skimmer vessels that are designed to capture and retain floating garbage. These actions appear to be the best approach to minimize the possibility that garbage from New York Harbor will collect on the New Jersey shoreline.

Because the garbage pollution problem falls appropriately under EPA's jurisdiction and is actively being addressed by that agency, I do not support expanding our existing navigation-oriented authority. However, I will be glad to participate in any meeting with EPA to discuss this further. The Corps of Engineers has contacted Mr. Tudor Davies, Director of the Office of Marine and Estuarine Protection at EPA here in Washington, D.C. Mr. Davies will be furnished a copy of this correspondence in order that he may be aware of your proposal and our response.

Your expression of confidence in the Army Corps of Engineers ability to help solve the floating garbage problem is appreciated.

Sincerely,

STEVEN DOLA,
Deputy for Management and Budget.
(Acting for Robert W. Page, Assistant Secretary of the Army (Civil Works)).

Enclosure.

CLEAN UP NEW YORK HARBOR

(1) The Corps of Engineers currently does not have the authority to collect any material in New York Harbor unless it poses a threat to navigation. The Corps has collected and disposed of driftwood since 1915 in New York Harbor.

(2) The EPA has the jurisdiction and responsibility to deal with the problem of floating garbage through the Clean Water Act of 1977 (Public Law 92-217) and the Ocean Dumping Act of 1972. Under the Ocean Dumping Act, Section 107(a), the EPA Administrator can request the services of another Federal agency to help with the enforcement of this act with or without reimbursement. This was done during the emergency of September 3, 1987.

(3) In September 1987, the Corps of Engineers (New York District) was asked to assist EPA in removing floating garbage from the ocean near the New Jersey coastline (8 miles outside the normal drift collection limit). The Corps was not reimbursed by EPA for the time and expense involved in modifying its drift collection nets to retain floating garbage, nor for the actual collection, hand-separation of garbage from burnable drift materials, or disposal of same.

(4) Garbage collected in September 1987 and found again this summer included used hypodermic syringes, sutures, used bandages, contaminated blood supplies, and other hospital wastes, as well as human waste. These materials pose a health threat to the Corps staff that must hand-separate this garbage from the drift material burned at sea under an EPA permit. The Corps is not currently equipped, trained or staffed to separate the two materials.

(5) Corps vessels used for drift collection in New York Harbor are certificated by the U.S. Coast Guard (USCG) for operation on lakes, bays, and sounds. In this area, this limit is defined as a line drawn from East Rockaway Inlet Breakwater light to Sandy Hook light. If the Corps was tasked with ocean garbage cleanup, the vessels would be operating beyond the USCG certification area. Certification of the existing drift collection vessels for ocean use may not be possible. Clogging of collection nets with garbage would reduce overall efficiencies. Garbage clogging sea strainers would cause vessel engines to overheat.

(6) The garbage found in the ocean and on nearby beaches has been identified as windblown refuse from sanitary landfills and barge loading facilities. These are being monitored more closely since last fall.

(7) The EPA published a plan in May 1988 to reduce the possibility of a recurrence of garbage washups. It is primarily a cooperative effort between the EPA and agencies of the States of New York and New Jersey to monitor the waters of the harbor using boats and helicopters. When observed, the source of the garbage would be directed to collect and dispose of it.

(8) The City of New York, Department of Sanitation, has obtained additional skimmer vessels, especially designed and built to capture and retain floating garbage.

(9) The EPA routinely hires consultants, specifically trained and equipped to handle hazardous and toxic wastes, to assist when it lacks the in-house resources to respond itself. EPA has a vessel now that could be used for this purpose.●

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, today I and Senator LAUTENBERG are introducing legislation to direct the Army Corps of Engineers to take a more active role in keeping the New York and New Jersey harbor areas clear of floating trash.

The corps already has substantial operations in the harbor to keep it clear of floating timbers and suchlike. These can be a hazard to shipping, and the corps has done well to keep the shipping lanes clear. These good works are carried out under the authority of the New York Harbor drift removal project.

Perhaps this may sound mundane, but we have the opportunity to make a rather minor modification to work the corps is already doing that could significantly reduce the amount of trash that ends up on our beaches. We would like to see the vessels already patrolling the harbor give some attention to sweeping up floating garbage as well as larger navigational hazards.

I would never intend for such work to interfere with the primary goal of the drift removal project, and I do not see that it would. The two goals are not incompatible. Both are worthy, and both are achievable.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the letter I sent today on this subject to Mr. Robert Page, Assistant Secretary of the Army for Civil Works, be included in the RECORD at the end of my remarks. I have asked him to take a look at my bill and the simple idea it contains, and see about getting on with it with all due speed.

Any effort the Corps of Engineers can make to prevent another summer of closed beaches and floating garbage slicks should be pursued with the utmost vigor, and I intend to see that this happens.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMITTEE ON ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS,
Washington, DC, March 3, 1989.

Hon. ROBERT PAGE,
Department of the Army, the Pentagon, Room 2E570, Washington, DC.

DEAR SECRETARY PAGE: I would like to call your attention to legislation I have introduced to expand the Corps' New York Harbor Drift Removal project.

As you and I have discussed, it is time the Corps started taking a greater interest in areas outside of its traditional mandate, including environmental clean up. This strikes me as a good place to start.

As you are well aware, beaches were closed in New York last summer because of washups of floating garbage, including medical waste. It is my understanding that the Corps presently operates several vessels in New York harbor equipped with nets to remove floating timbers and other material that may interfere with navigation. It would not seem difficult to instruct these very same vessels to collect other types of floating material as it is encountered. Such an effort strikes me simple, cost effective and sensible.

Please investigate the feasibility of implementing such a system before this coming summer season and report back to me. If there are other methods available to the Corps to accomplish the same ends, please make me aware of them. Thank you for your attention to this matter.

Sincerely,

DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN.●

By Mr. SIMON (for himself, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. CRANSTON, and Mr. GORE):

S. 507. A bill to prohibit investments in, and certain other activities with respect to, South Africa, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

ANTI-APARTHEID ACT AMENDMENTS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, today I am introducing with my colleagues Senator KENNEDY, Senator CRANSTON, and Senator GORE the Anti-Apartheid Act Amendments of 1989 calling for comprehensive sanctions against South Africa. This is identical to the bill introduced by Representative RON DELLUMS, H.R. 21. We believe that this measure—which includes a trade embargo and strong disinvestment provisions—continues to represent the most meaningful way of exerting pressure on the South African Government for peaceful change and the emergence of justice in that country.

Just 1 year ago South Africa banned 17 key antiapartheid organizations and significantly restricted the activities of the largest trade union federation, the Congress of South African Trade Unions. During the past year alone more than 30 organizations have been banned.

We have also seen, in the Delmas Trial convictions, a judiciary in South Africa that is willing to convict antiapartheid leaders for their peaceful protest against apartheid. That is something we do not understand here in the United States. And when angry, victimized people cannot even express their views freely, violence becomes more and more inevitable. Even the religious community, which is now the single most important public antiapartheid voice, faces intimidation and threats.

Nelson Mandela and nearly all other political prisoners have yet to be released. The Government continues its efforts to gag and silence the press. And the state of emergency continues. The recent Tripartite Agreement among South Africa, Angola, and Cuba, which will bring independence to Namibia, was a significant step toward peace in that region. I applaud the South African Government for their participation in the agreement. I welcome meaningful efforts for peace in that troubled region and commend all the parties to the agreement for this achievement and for finally opening the way for Namibian independence. But that in no way substitutes for the need to address the central question of how apartheid in South Africa is going to end. We want that change to be peaceful. And both internal and external pressures are critical to bringing the South African Government and the real black leaders together for serious talks on ending apartheid.

I hope that we can develop a greater consensus here in the Senate for an effective and vigorous policy on South Africa and that we can encourage more productive cooperation between Congress and the new administration.

It is essential that this cooperative approach include efforts on the part of the administration to follow through on multilateral measures that may be taken to undermine apartheid. The Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986 anticipated this important component to our own efforts. At the United Nations, we need to introduce our own sanctions and promote them, not vote against them. We need to provide active leadership in the international community for concerted action against apartheid. As chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Subcommittee on African Affairs, I plan to introduce, in the near future, a resolution to urge the administration to move on the multilateral front, to press South Africa's other major trading partners—Japan, West Germany, the United Kingdom, France, and Italy—to join in our own sanctions and to agree on other measures designed to bring about peaceful change in South Africa.

The community of nations is watching with great interest what steps a new United States administration and a new Congress will take on the question of apartheid in South Africa. We await change in South Africa, and look for hopeful signs, but there are few. But this is clear: The world is today more ready to follow our lead in pressing for peaceful change in South Africa.●

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, today I am pleased to join with my colleagues Senators SIMON and KENNEDY in introducing legislation designed to combat the evils of apartheid in South Africa.

This legislation is necessary because the 1986 comprehensive sanctions bill did not go far enough in pressing for an end to the abhorrent system of apartheid. The South African regime has managed to circumvent several provisions of that law by exploiting loopholes; other provisions have suffered because of weak enforcement by the administration. Additionally, other nations have profited by U.S. sanctions because the President did not pursue a multilateral strategy for opposing apartheid, as Congress recommended.

In the meantime, repression in South Africa has grown worse, although a near total press blackout has concealed much of the ravages of increasing oppression:

Virtually all avenues for peaceful dissent have been foreclosed.

Thousands of apartheid opponents have been detained.

Many hundreds of these have been children. Many have been tortured.

Virtually all organizations, including church and labor groups, who have questioned apartheid, have been banned.

Opponents of the regime are bombed at home and murdered abroad.

We must therefore act. Indeed, we are now obligated by law to take the necessary next step to curb sharply our economic relations with the South African regime. The Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986 called for additional measures if substantial progress was not made within a year. And the situation is far from improved—it has in fact grown considerably worse. This legislation will take that required next step. These measures will close the loopholes, broaden the scope of the sanctions, and require negotiations with other industrialized democracies to ensure a strong, multilateral approach to opposing apartheid.

The choice of whether or not to do business with the racist regime in South Africa is a moral one. We must choose the path that demonstrates America has an unshakeable commitment to the forces of democracy.

There are important startegic concerns involved as well. We must develop a strong relationship with black leaders who will one day have a strong voice in governing South Africa. And we must try to convince the white minority that we will resume normal relations once progress is achieved, and that we seek to protect their political rights under majority rule. Our commitment must be to human rights, freedom, and democracy for all South Africans, black and white.

Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senators SIMON, CRANSTON, and GORE in reintroducing a bill that will once again place the United States in the forefront of efforts to end apartheid in South Africa; the Anti-Apartheid Act Amendments of 1989.

Nearly 2 years have passed since Congress overrode President Reagan's veto and made the Comprehensive Anti-Apartheid Act of 1986 the law of this land. That bill became America's first truly effective step in ending racism in South Africa. Today, with the introduction of this legislation, Congress begins the next step in that worldwide struggle.

When it passed the 1986 sanctions bill, Congress made clear its intention to move forward with additional sanctions if the Government of South Africa failed to make substantial progress toward ending apartheid. Over the last 2 years, the Botha government has abandoned all pretense of reform; it has renewed the state of emergency, it has banned opposition organizations and individuals. It continues its ruthless aggression against its neighbors and shows blatant disregard for human rights and the rule of law. Clearly, the time has now come for additional sanctions.

As the groundbreaking study, uprooting poverty, has demonstrated, black South Africans live in worse conditions than their brothers and sisters in the rest of black Africa. For instance, infant mortality of blacks in South Africa is higher than that in many other African nations, including Botswana, Zimbabwe, Kenya, the Congo, and Zambia. In measuring economic inequality, South Africa has the worst disparity of any of the 57 countries in the world for which data are available. When it comes to economic injustice, South Africa has the most shameful record in the world. Apartheid's pass laws, artificial homelands, the group areas act, and the forced removals make apartheid a daily living nightmare for black men, women, and children in South Africa.

There are those who say that comprehensive sanctions have not worked and will not work, and that they will only harden the resistance to change inside South Africa. But in 40 years of silence, throughout the years of cooperation, maintenance of the status quo, and years of constructive engagement, apartheid has not ended. Our modest sanctions over the last 2½ years have not worked, because they do not go far enough and because there has been no international cooperation in the effort to end apartheid. In fact, the United States has repeatedly vetoed the efforts in the United Nations to isolate the regime in Pretoria.

Apartheid will only be ended with a clear, consistent, and concerted policy of all nations working together to apply the full range of political, diplomatic, and economic pressure against the South African regime.

The American people have always cherished freedom and human dignity. We share a responsibility to protect civil rights and promote the rule of law. Let us hope that, as one of his first steps in foreign policy, President Bush will reverse the drift of complacency regarding South Africa of the past 8 years. I urge the administration to put the United States Government at the forefront of the struggle against apartheid by lending its full support to this legislation.

We are now in a new Congress, in a new administration, and it is time to take new steps against apartheid. I urge my colleagues to put the United States on the right side of history and justice in South Africa by supporting this important legislation.

By Mr. INOUYE (for himself, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. NUNN, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. WIRTH, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. PELL, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. EXON, Mr. CHAFEE, and Mr. DOLE):

S. 511. A bill to recognize the organization known as the National Academies of Practice; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RECOGNITION OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMIES OF PRACTICE

● Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which would provide a Federal charter for the National Academies of Practice. This organization represents outstanding practitioners who have made significant contributions to the practice of applied psychology, dentistry, medicine, nursing, optometry, osteopathy, podiatry, social work, and veterinary medicine. When fully established, each of the 9 academies will possess 100 distinguished practitioners selected by their peers. This umbrella organization will be able to provide the Congress of the United States and the executive branch with considerable health policy expertise, especially from the perspective of those individuals who are in the forefront of actually providing health care.

Mr. President, as we continue to grapple with the many complex issues surrounding the delivery of health care services, it is clearly in our best interest to ensure that the Congress have systematic access to the recommendations of an interdisciplinary body of health care practitioners.●

By Mrs. KASSEBAUM:

S. 512. A bill to amend the State Dependent Care Development Grants Act to enhance and improve the quality of the child care services provided under such act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

CHILD CARE SERVICE ENHANCEMENT AND QUALITY IMPROVEMENT ACT

Mrs. KASSEBAUM. Mr. President, the proportion of childen under 6 with mothers in the work force has increased by nearly 80 percent since the early seventies. In 1988, 51 percent of all children under 6 had working mothers. It is estimated that the continuation of this trend will find two-thirds of all preschool children with mothers in the work force by 1995. That is nearly 15 million children.

While this trend has been all too evident to those parents struggling to balance the needs of career and family, in many ways our society has been slow to accommodate this new reality. It is for this reason that I appreciate the leadership shown by Senators DODD and HATCH in the Children and Family Subcommittee. Their legislation, the hearings they have held, and the many bills sponsored by other Members have played a vital role in bringing much-needed attention to the problems facing working parents. I believe the debate regarding the act for better child care has made all of us more sensitive to the experiences of mothers who, whether they work because of financial necessity or personal choice, cannot work at all unless they find safe, dependable, and nurturing child care that fits their various needs, schedules, and pocketbooks. Appropriately, this debate has also heightened awareness about those mothers who choose to stay at home and make their own sacrifices in terms of careers delayed and incomes forgone.

In following the hearings and debate on child care legislation, in my correspondence and conversations with constituents, and in remembering my own experiences as a mother, I am convinced that parents can use help in assuring that quality child care is both available and affordable. Unfortunately, this is not our society's only need. Already, in the opening weeks of a new Congress, we are discussing billions of dollars of new spending—to address the savings and loan crisis, to build a superconducting supercollider, to clean up environmental pollution at Federal nuclear facilities, to intensify the battle against drugs, to help the homeless, to repair our Nation's aging transportation infrastructure, to protect families from the unpredictable burden of long-term care for the elderly.

All of these needs are important, and many of them have very direct effects on children and families. So, too, does the issue of deficit spending. An economy that boasts high inflation, high interest rates, and an inability to compete in world markets can have a very serious and negative effect on family life.

For me, then, the question has not been whether there is a need for better child care. The question has been how can we afford to address this need in light of all our other legitimate needs, including the one for spending restraints. I have come to the conclusion that we just cannot afford to establish a Federal child care infrastructure that will require more Federal dollars with each passing year. Nor can we afford to use direct payments or Tax Code adjustments to help with the expenses of all parents with children in day care. The ABC bill will cost $2.5 billion in its first year. Making the current dependent-care tax credit refundable and providing a new tax credit for each child under 4, as recommended by the President, will cost $2.4 billion. I wish we could afford to be this generous, but we cannot.

The legislation I am introducing today, the Child Care Service Enhancement and Quality Improvement Act, attempts to address the need for a high-quality supply of child care options without relying on rigid Federal standards or continued dependence on an expensive Federal bureaucracy. It does so, first, by providing $300 million for State block grants to be used for the planning, development, establishment, or expansion of dependent care services. These funds could be used to increase the supply of child care providers by supporting recruitment programs that encourage individuals to become child care providers; by providing loans, grants, and technical assistance programs that help providers meet State licensing or accreditation standards; and by assisting in the establishment of innovative child care programs that can serve as models for other new providers. The block grant approach requires a 25-percent State match, and it relies heavily on the creativity and flexibility of States and communities, who are in the best position to identify and meet the various needs of their own neighborhoods, families, and work force.

These funds could also be used to promote improved child care quality by supporting training programs for child care workers and regular State inspections of licensed providers. While I doubt that any action would guarantee absolute protection against some of the tragedies that have occurred in day care settings, I appreciate the recommendations that child care researchers have made regarding minimum standards, and my bill requires that States adopt their own accreditation or licensing standards in the areas of staff/child ratios, group size, provider qualifications, health and safety, and parental involvement and access.

A high-quality supply of services is useless, of course, if there is no way for parents to locate them. Thus, the funds provided by this legislation may also be used to establish or expand State and local resources and referral systems that describe licensed providers and match them with varying family needs.

Finally, this legislation requires that the Department of Labor conduct a study of the liability issues related to child care services. If we are to make real progress in increasing the supply of child care options, it is vital that employers play a more active part in providing such services for their employees. The growth of employer-provided child care and child care in general has been restricted by liability insurance concerns.

What is conspicuously absent from this bill is any direct payment or Tax Code subsidization of child care services. After much thought, I have come to believe that any money we spend on child care should focus on the priorities of increasing quality and supply. As we have discovered in the past, tax breaks are self-defeating if, in the end, we have to raise taxes to cover their costs. Additionally, I believe the needs of the lowest income can be better and more economically addressed through Head Start expansion and welfare reform. If other families need financial assistance, we need to look at that as well, but not in the context of a child care initiative.

Mr. President, I recognize that this legislation stops short of the goals that many have set for addressing the child care need. But I see the multiple problems relating to working parents and the care of their children as beyond the scope of one bill. To be fully responsive to the needs of working families, businesses have to be more innovative in offering flex-time, job sharing, part-time employment, and parental leave to their employees who are parents. Cafeteria plans have to become more widespread so that employees have a greater choice of benefits, including child care services. Our economy has to grow stronger, so that we can offer better jobs, a higher minimum wage, and lower tax rates to everyone. Efforts toward teenage pregnancy prevention have to be strengthened and our child support laws must be more responsive and more strictly enforced. The education and training that bring well-paying jobs within a worker's grasp must be supported. We in Congress can pass legislation addressing some of these goals; to address other goals, we can only urge others to assume responsibility.

Child care is a decision that all parents must make on the basis of their financial and career needs, as well as the emotional needs of their children and themselves. Like all choices, there will always be sacrifices involved. No Government program can protect us from that reality, but Government can make an effort to ensure that our choices are as broad as possible. The legislation I propose today makes an effort to do that without ignoring the other looming reality of the Federal budget.

Mr. President, I have given a lot of thought to this issue. I think it is an extremely important one before us in the 101st Congress and I urge my colleagues to take a look at the legislation I am introducing today.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 513. A bill to amend chapters 83 and 84 or title 5, United States Code, to extend certain retirement provisions of such chapters which are applicable to law enforcement officers, to inspectors of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, inspectors and canine enforcement officers of the U.S. Customs Service, and revenue officers of the Internal Revenue Service; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT AMENDMENTS

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation on behalf of Senators PELL, SIMON, and myself that would extend the early retirement option for Federal employees in hazardous occupations to inspectors of the Customs Service and the Immigration Service, as well as revenue officers in the Internal Revenue Service and Customs Canine Enforcement Officers [CEO's].

Under current law, Federal employees who work 20 years in a "hazardous" occupation are eligible for retirement at age 50. Currently this classification includes, among others, Federal law enforcement officers and firefighters.

The bill I am sponsoring would expand the job categories designated as "hazardous" to include Customs inspectors, IRS revenue officers, INS inspectors, and CEO's. The dedicated men and women in these four categories of Federal employment are faced daily with extremely stressful and sometimes dangerous situations in service of their country. This stress leads to a high turnover rate in these Federal occupations, that in turn lowers the Federal Government's productivity.

Last year I introduced similar legislation, S. 2031, which did not include CEO's. I have included CEO's in this year's bill because they perform duties very similar to those of Customs inspectors, but have additional burden of controlling a highly trained dog.

Offering an "early out" retirement option for Customs and INS inspectors, as well as for IRS revenue officers and CEO's, will help provide an incentive to these employees to stay in their positions for longer periods of time. Therefore, the net result of providing such an early out option is a more productive Federal Government, as well as a lower Federal deficit.

For example, a July 1985 study by the IRS' Assistant Commissioner for Collections, estimated that an early out option for IRS revenue officers would reduce annual training costs by over $2 million and result in increased annual revenue collections by approximately $100 million.

Mr. President, this early out legislation for hazardous occupations would be carefully distinguished from other early out bills that have been introduced to shrink the size of the Federal work force. My legislation is designed solely to reward those whose civil service positions entail significant hazards. Unlike other early out bills, it has no provision which prevents an agency from filling a vacated position for 3 years.

In this era of continued high Federal deficits, the Congress should be taking all steps necessary to improve both our Government's productivity and efficiency. The legislation I am introducing today makes a limited, but serious attempt to meet that goal.●

By Mr. HELMS:

S.J. Res. 71. Joint resolution designating April 16 through 22, 1989, as "National Ceramic Tile Industry Recognition Week"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL CERAMIC TILE INDUSTRY RECOGNITION WEEK

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, today I am offering a joint resolution designating the week of April 16 through 22, 1989, as "National Ceramic Tile Industry Recognition Week."

The tile industry, in its various forms, has evolved into a prosperous and rapidly growing business. The industry employs thousands of tradesmen with various skills, from the mining of specific raw materials, to the manufacturing, distribution, and installation of the finished products in homes.

Mr. President, I am proud to announce that just last August, construction began on a new manufacturing facility in Morganton, NC, for Summitville, Inc. This 160,000-square-foot facility, called Summitville Carolina, Inc. is scheduled to be completed in October 1989, and will create as many as 250 new jobs over the next several years.

Among the first of several products this facility will produce will be 21,000 square feet of large-unit glazed floor tile a day. Because of the technological advances experienced by the ceramic tile industry, this new facility will have the capacity through the use of two 1,400-ton presses and a roller-hearth kiln, to produce tiles in less than 1 hour at over 2,000 degrees Fahrenheit.

Mr. President, I hope this resolution will draw well deserved attention to the ceramic tile industry and its great advancements throughout history. I urge all Senators to join with me in supporting this worthy industry.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

OIL PRODUCTION IN THE ARCTIC NATIONAL WILDLIFE REFUGE

● Mr. JOHNSTON. Mr. President, last year the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources and the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries requested that the Office of Technology Assessment [OTA] study the technologies needed for Arctic oil production and their effect on future oil production in Alaska. The OTA has now completed its review and has issued a report, "Oil Production in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge: The Technology and the Alaskan Oil Content."

Earlier this year, I introduced S. 406, the Arctic Coastal Plain Competitive Oil and Gas Leasing Act. This legislation, which is similar to legislation reported favorably last Congress by the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, would authorize a phased oil and gas leasing program in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge [ANWR], with strict environmental safeguards. To better understand all of the issues involved with the development of oil reserves in ANWR, I requested this OTA review.

The OTA report focused on the oil field technology being used to develop the Alaskan North Slope oil resources and the likely configuration of that technology as might be applied in development of the ANWR coastal plain. Additionally, the report examined the prospects for future North Slope oil production.

The report concludes that development of oil reserves on the North Slope of Alaska in an environmentally safe manner is possible, as current production techniques have improved, and will continue to improve, upon the technologies used in the Prudhoe Bay oil fields. The report also states that the geographical nature of the coastal plain and other oil rich areas on the North Slope are similar so that state of the art technologies developed and improved on such North Slope fields as Kuparauk and Endicott could also be applied to development in the coastal plain.

The report also addresses the potential for future North Slope development. A 1987 Department of the Interior [DOI] report estimated there to be a 19-percent probability of finding commercially viable quantities of oil. With regard to this, the OTA report states that "DOI's estimate of the likelihood of finding economically recoverable quantities of oil in ANWR may be conservative."

Finally, the report notes that environmental concerns still exist regarding any development in ANWR. I recognize the controversy surrounding this entire issue, and have taken measures in S. 406 to ensure that such environmental concerns are addressed. I believe that this OTA report supports what we have aleady learned through extensive and thorough hearings, that the environmentally safe development of oil reserves in ANWR is possible.

Mr. President, I ask that a summary of the report be printed in the RECORD.

The summary follows:

OIL PRODUCTION IN THE ARCTIC NATIONAL WILDLIFE REFUGE: THE TECHNOLOGY AND THE ALASKAN OIL CONTEXT

The coastal plain of the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge (ANWR), in the extreme northeast corner of Alaska, is the focus of a major debate among interest groups asking Congress either to approve or to block leasing, exploration, and development of the area for its suspected oil resources. Those opposing oil development fear that it would seriously damage a unique and invaluable Arctic ecosystem and wilderness area in return for a small chance to put a temporary dent in growing U.S. oil imports. Those favoring development, in contrast, view the coastal plain as the United States' most promising remaining area for finding giant oilfields, and they believe that the oil industry can explore and develop ANWR without significantly compromising its environmental values.

This report focuses on two issues that form a part of Congress' decision about ANWR's future: 1) Oilfield technology. To what extent would ANWR oil development resemble existing development on the North Slope? 2) Potential role in Alaskan oil production. How credible are recent projections of an imminent decline in North Slope oil production—which ANWR oil might eventually replace?

ARCTIC OILFIELD DEVELOPMENT AND TECHNOLOGY

If oil is found, its development would involve building a network of industrial infrastructure on the coastal plain—including pipelines; roads; gravel pads supporting drilling rigs and wells, separation plants and other production facilities, and housing for workers; one or more airfields and docks; graval pits; and other support facilities. The "footprint" of this infrastructure—the land area covered—would be relatively small, less than 1 percent of the area of the coastal plain. On the other hand, the physical coverage would be spread out somewhat like a spiderweb, and some further physical effects, like infiltration of road dust and changes in drainage patterns, will spread out from the land directly impacted. The significance of these effects to the health of the Arctic ecosystem is a source of controversy for existing North Slope oilfield development and is a crucial issue in the debate over ANWR's future.

Development in ANWR is likely to resemble recent North Slope development at the Kuparuk and Endicott fields, even though at least another 10 years could pass before ANWR development could occur. Although considerable changes have occurred in North Slope oil production during the past 10 years, the future rate of change in Arctic technology and practices applicable to ANWR development should be more gradual than in the past. Industry knowledge of how to operate efficiently in the onshore Arctic environment has reached a state of considerable maturity. In addition, physical conditions on the ANWR coastal plain, while not identical to conditions within the current North Slope development area, are similar and do not represent a new challenge to industry technology per se.

There are some pressures for technological change, however. Regulatory pressures could arise from dissatisfaction with current environmental performance at Prudhoe Bay and the other developed North Slope fields, or because State and Federal authorities seek a higher standard of environmental protection at ANWR because of its status as a wildlife refuge. Despite improvements over time in environmental management on the North Slope—in reduced requirements for surface usage and gravel, improved handling of oilfield service operations, and more attention to waste management—critics continue to express concerns about several environmental issues. Their principal concerns include disposal of reserve pit waste and of other solid and liquid wastes, air pollution, fresh water supply, environmental monitoring, and wildlife habitat alteration or destruction. The operators of the North Slope oilfields reject most claims of environmental deterioration.

Changes will also arise from continued improvements in production technologies, especially in directional drilling, which allows large areas of a field to be drained from a single drilling pad, and in enhanced oil recovery (EOR).

NORTH SLOPE OIL PRODUCTION

Today, the Alaskan North Slope provides about 2 million barrels per day of oil to the United States, nearly a quarter of total U.S. crude oil production. North Slope production will likely begin to decline around 1990-91, and fall to half of current levels or below by the year 2000. However, the large uncertainties involved in forecasting future production, recent strides in cutting oilfield costs, and a history of overly pessimistic forecasts of Alaskan and total U.S. oil production preclude ruling out a more gradual decline.

Additional production to slow the expected decline would have to come from either more intensive development of existing fields, development of discovered but currently undeveloped fields, or finding and developing undiscovered resources. None of these prospects are highly promising.

Intensified development of existing fields—including drilling wells on closer spacing, exploiting the less productive margins of fields, and EOR—has added several years to the date of expected production decline, and continues to be pursued with vigor. For example prospects are good for EOR beyond that already in place or scheduled. However, the increments of recovery and production from the available EOR technologies will be small and will accrue over a long period. No readily foreseeable technologies promise to "turn around" expectations of declining production at Prudhoe Bay and other North Slope fields. Similar conclusions hold for future infill drilling and other means of increasing production.

Starting production from the discovered but nonproducing fields also is unlikely to reverse the production decline. These fields do not have large volumes of recoverable resources. One much-discussed field—the West Sak field overlying the producing Kuparuk River field—contains at least 15 billion barrels of in-place oil, but no technologies are available that can economically recover more than a small fraction of this very thick oil contained in a poor reservoir. ARCO, the majority interest-holder, remains optimistic about West Sak production, and has scheduled new recovery experiments for 1989. However, the potential for new advanced-recovery technologies is highly uncertain, with significant technical and cost problems remaining.

Finding and developing undiscovered fields could help stem the decline, but recent exploration on the North Slope and offshore in the Beaufort Sea has been disappointing. Although large discoveries cannot be ruled out, prospects seem to have dimmed considerably.

Both the oil industry and the Department of the Interior (DOI) have represented the development of ANWR oil as the most promising option to offset the projected North Slope decline. Policymakers should understand, however, that all estimates of the resource potential of ANWR are highly speculative. Also, even with rapid development, ANWR oil could not begin flowing before the year 2000. DOI has concluded that there is a 19 percent chance of finding economically recoverable oil in ANWR, and if it is found, the estimated mean volume is 3.23 billion barrels. The Energy Information Administration, in a review of DOI's assessment, has concluded that the likelihood of finding recoverable oil is virtually a certainty rather than 19 percent. OTA agrees that DOI's 19 percent estimate is too low, but is skeptical that the correct probability is close to 100 percent.

THE COASTAL PLAIN OF THE ARCTIC NATIONAL WILDLIFE REFUGE

Comprises 1.5 million acres of the 19-million-acre Arctic National Wildlife Refuge.

Extreme northeast corner of Alaska; western edge 60 miles east of Prudhoe Bay, the Nation's largest oilfield.

Long, extremely cold winters and short, cool summers.

Oil leasing must be authorized by the U.S. Congress.

DOI has recommended orderly oil and gas leasing of the area.

Considered by the oil industry to be the most promising unexplored area in the United States for discovering supergiant oilfields.

DOI estimates a 19 percent chance of finding economically recoverable oil; estimated mean of 3.23 billion barrels (annual U.S. oil consumption is about 6 billion barrels).

Considered by environmentalists to have outstanding wilderness values and to be an especially important habitat for caribou, polar bears, musk oxen, and migrating birds.

Prime calving ground for the approximately 200,000 caribou of the Porcupine caribou herd.●

THE SCHOOL BREAKFAST PROGRAM

● Mr. BOSCHWITZ. Mr. President, March is recognized as National Nutrition Month. In addition, the American School Food Service Association has designated the week of March 5-11 as National School Breakfast Week.

I have assumed the position of ranking Republican on the Nutrition Subcommittee during this Congress. As a member of the subcommittee, I have been a long-time supporter of the school lunch and school breakfast programs. I've visited and eaten at several schools in Minnesota during my time in the Senate.

Over the past couple years we have seen increasing attention focused on the School Breakfast Program. Many school teachers have told me how difficult it is to teach a hungry student who has not had breakfast. A provision I authored to increase reimbursement for school breakfast was included in the Hunger Prevention Act enacted last year.

The federally funded School Breakfast Program has been an excellent investment in preparing today's children to be tomorrow's strong, healthy, and well-educated leaders. However, many school districts have been slow to adopt the program. Objections to starting up a breakfast program, however well-intentioned, affect those least able to bear it—children.

Recently the National Education Association [NEA] released a report about the effects of hunger on children's ability to learn. "The Relationship Between Nutrition and Learning: A School Employee's Guide to Information and Action" is the title of the report that the NEA developed along with the Food Research and Action Center. This report highlights the importance of food and good nutrition to growing children.

The study provides information about the breakfast program and other children nutrition programs and provides suggestions for educators and school employees about how to get a breakfast program started at their school. I ask that articles about the report and the School Breakfast Program from the Washington Post and the New York Times be printed in the RECORD.

The future of our country's children are at stake. As any parent or teacher can attest, we cannot feed a child's mind without first feeding his or her stomach. I would hope that educators or interested parents would ask their schools to look at the breakfast program and consider participation. This is a very important initiative that meets a critical need for our Nation's children.

EATING WELL

EDUCATORS SOUND THE ALARM AS EVIDENCE SHOWS THAT HUNGER CAN IMPEDE LEARNING.

(By Marian Burros)

WASHINGTON, Feb. 7.—Increasing poverty among children in the United States has generated such concern among educators that the National Education Association has released a report documenting the deleterious effects of hunger on a child's ability to learn.

The report, "The Relationship Between Nutrition and Learning: A School Employee's Guide to Information and Action," also provides practical suggestions for parents and school employees interested in attracting more children to the free and reduced-price school lunch and breakfast programs and for improving the quality of the meals.

The report comes at a time when the final Reagan Administration budget recommended a $614.4 million cut in the 1990 school lunch program. Research published in the American Journal of Agricultural Economics in 1975 indicated that for every 10 cents cut from the lunch program there was a 10 percent decline in participation.

Spokesmen for the Bush Administration said there would be no comment on the status of the school lunch program until after the President's budget speech on Thursday evening.

At a news conference here last week, Mary Hatwood Futrell, president of the education association, said the report deserved immediate action. "Today one out of every five American children is poor," she said. "If the trend continues, by 1990, 40 percent of our children will be living in poverty."

For some children, she continued, "school breakfast or lunch may be not only the best meal they get, it may be their only meal, and hungry or undernourished children find it harder to learn."

According to the report, a 1986 survey of emergency food centers in Minnesota, for example, found that 21 percent of 13,176 households with children reported that their children missed meals on a regular basis because there was not enough money to buy food.

The report also mentioned another survey conducted in 1987 by the United States Conference of Mayors. It documented an 18 percent increase in the number of families with children who were seeking emergency food in major cities nationwide.

The education association report also cited recent studies that examined the impact of hunger on learning. The findings indicated that hunger leads to nervousness, irritability and disinterest; that skipping breakfast often causes nausea, dizziness, headache and fatigue in the morning, and that the hungry child is passive, apathetic and timid.

In 1987, for example, researchers at Boston and Tufts Universities investigated the impact of the school breakfast program on children in Lawrence, Mass. They looked at achievement test results of children in the third through sixth grades for the year before and the year after the breakfast program began. They concluded that the school breakfasts were responsible for significant improvements in attendance and in standardized achievement test scores.

The education association's report, prepared by the Food Research and Action Center, a Washington-based nonprofit organization that works on behalf of the disadvantaged, was commissioned because educators were concerned that increasing numbers of children were unable to do their school work because they are hungry or malnourished. Teachers said they had heard more and more children complaining that they hadn't had much to eat or had stomach aches; some teachers reported that students actually fainted in class.

Buttressing their observations was a 1987 report from the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, which found that more than two-thirds of the 22,000 teachers surveyed nationwide in kindergarten through high school said undernourisment was a problem in their schools.

The school lunch program served 24 million children in 1987 and 1988, half of whom received meals free-of-charge, while the school breakfast program reached 2.7 million. Before budget cuts made by the Reagan Administration in 1981, the school-lunch program served 26 million children, the school breakfast program, 3.8 million.

The National Education Association plans to join other groups in lobbying Congress to block the proposed cuts in the 1990 school-lunch program.

Mrs. Futrell said the Federal Government was not likely to spend as much money on social services, including school lunch and breakfast, as it has in the past. "I think we will be relying more on volunteers, private organizations and the business community to support the programs," she said.

SCHOOL LUNCHES NEED NOT BE FEARED

The National Education Association report recommends that teachers, school officials and other school employees work in their schools to improve participation in lunch and breakfast programs. The report provides these practical suggestions for improving school programs:

Turn for help to active parents, parent-teacher associations and sympathetic school board members to help start school breakfast programs.

Be prepared to answer questions about costs, cooking equipment and time. The school breakfast program can be run at no cost to the school system, because labor costs, food supplies and services, administration and supervision are eligible for Federal reimbursement.

Bus schedules can be staggered to make it easier to serve children as they arrive at school.

Parents should be aware of the programs available. Many children who are eligible to participate do not, in part because children do not always take home the information. Sometimes families that are not eligible in the beginning of the school year become eligible later.

Program applications should be easy to understand. If there are language barriers, find volunteers to help families fill out the forms.

STUDENTS RESPOND TO VARIETY

Parents asked to verify their eligibility are often afraid to, but research indicates that many of these people are eligible. A trained volunteer could reduce fear and confusion.

Work to remove the stigma attached to programs by making participation attractive to children at all income levels. Make the cafeteria an attractive place to eat, for example, improve the quality of the food and the way it is served.

Provide bag lunches for these who do not want to eat in the cafeteria.

Anonymity of participants is essential. While it is illegal to differentiate in any visible way between children who pay full price for meals and those who do not, there are ways to keep that information more private. Meal payments can be collected in the school secretary's office, for example, or parents can be billed monthly for full and reduced price meals.

On nutritional issues, the report recommended that meals adhere to United States Dietary Guidelines. It said low-fat dairy products, fresh fruits and vegetables, legumes and whole-grain breads should be served frequently. The report suggested that nutrition education be incorporated into the curriculum.

It urged schools to provide variety and flexibility in meals, offering low-calorie foods for weight-conscious students and appropriate meals for ethnic, cultural and religious groups.

If the school has a vending machine the food in it should be nutritious, the report said Current Federal regulations prohibit soda, chewing gum, hard candies and frozen deserts from being sold in food-service areas during meal periods. But they can be sold outside the cafeteria, and before and after meals.

Parents and school officials interested in improving school meals might also review two books. "Fuel for Excellence: FRAC's Guide to School Breakfast Expansion," available for $8.50 by writing to the Food Research and Action Center, 1319 F Street NW, Suite 500, Washington, D.C. 20004, and "Changing the Course: Eating to Reduce Cancer Risk," which can be obtained free by calling the American Cancer Society.

FUEL UP AT BREAKFAST

(By Catherine O'Neill)

Almost every school day, Martin and his mom have a small argument. It goes like this:

"Martin, eat your breakfast."

"I don't want it. I hate oatmeal."

"You need a good breakfast to help you get through the morning at school. No more arguing. Now eat it!"

"Yuck," Martin mutters. But he always eats his morning cereal eventually. He doesn't really hate it—he's just in the habit of fussing about it.

Martin's mother is right about breakfast. A healthful morning meal does help kids do their schoolwork. In fact, good nutrition is esential for learning, according to a report issued by the National Education Association (NEA) last month. Children need plenty of good food at regular meals so that they will be physically and mentally ready to learn every hour of the day.

Martin is lucky. His family has enough money to buy the ingredients for a nutritious breakfast, lunch and dinner every day. Unfortunately, that isn't true for many children. According to U.S. census figures, one in every five American children lives in poverty. For some of these kids, the food they receive at school breakfast and lunch programs is all the nourishment they get in a day. The National Education Association is worried about students who are undernourished. Their health and their ability to learn are threatened because they don't get enough to eat. The NEA is urging the government to support programs to feed school-age children.

"School breakfast and lunch programs are as essential to good education as English, math, and science," says Mary Hatwood Futrell, NEA president.

Here are some of the things that can happen if kids do not eat well over a long period of time. Researchers call such children undernourished. Undernourished children are less physically active and less curious than kids who get plenty of healthful food. They have a harder time paying attention to what the teacher says and concentrating on their own work. They also have more trouble making friends.

Happily, these bad effects usually go away if kids begin to follow the right diet. Then they can catch up quickly. What about kids who usually get enough to eat but are hungry sometimes—for instance, on the mornings when they don't get any breakfast? They run into trouble, too. Hunger causes nervousness and crankiness. A hungry student isn't too interested in what's going on in class.

Going hungry in the morning can also make you feel dizzy and sick to your stomach. You may have felt like that in your morning classes if you got up too late to eat breakfast one day. Studies have shown that skipping breakfast makes it harder to solve problems—something you have to do in school every day.

How did researchers prove that eating breakfast is so important? Scientists who study nutrition have done many experiments that show what happens when kids skip meals. In one study, a researcher tested kids ages 9 to 11. He gave the students reading and arithmetic tests on four different days, one week apart. On two of the days, the kids took the tests after they had eaten a good breakfast. The other two times, they took tests after going without food for 12 hours. The kids made fewer mistakes on the tests on the days they had eaten breakfast.

So you can see that it's important to eat a good breakfast every day. Choose items from the four food groups. They are: 1) Fruits and vegetables. 2) Grains, breads and cereals. 3) Milk products. 4) Beans, nuts, meat and eggs. In general, nutritionists say that kids should have four servings of fruits and vegetables, four servings of grains, three servings of milk products and two servings of beans, nuts, meat or eggs each day. You can get a good start on those requirements at breakfast. Remember to avoid eating too much fat and sugar, and be sure to include some fruit or fruit juice in your morning meal. Once your morning fuel is in your body, you'll be in top condition for learning, playing sports and having fun with your friends.

Even though Martin complains about having to eat breakfast, he feels better each morning after he eats his oatmeal.

TIPS FOR PARENTS

School employees and concerned citizens and parents can help ensure that needy kids get a healthful breakfast on school mornings, according to the National Education Association's new report "The Relationship Between Nutrition and Learning." Among the recommendations:

Start a breakfast program in your school if one does not already exist. Child nutrition programs are available to all public and private nonprofit schools that request them. For information on how to get started, write to the Food Research and Activity Center to order "Fuel for Excellence: FRAC's Guide to School Breakfast Expansion," FRAC, 1319 F St. NW, Suite 500, Washington, D.C. 20004.

Help parents apply for free or reduced-price meals for their children.

Involve students and families in menu planning.

Make sure that the school lunch break is long enough to allow students time to eat.

Make sure that students who receive free or reduced-price meals are not singled out from their peers.

LOIS BARNES

● Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. President, I rise today to congratulate Kentucky's recipient of the National Endowment for the Humanities Teacher-Scholar Award for 1989, Mrs. Lois Barnes. I first read about Mrs. Barnes' accomplishment in an article in the February 1, 1989 edition of the Lexington Herald-Leader. I would like to insert that article into the RECORD.

The National Endowment for the Humanities and the Reader's Digest sponsored the program which provides grants to 53 teachers. Each teacher will use the grant to do an independent study on a project of their choice during the 1989-90 academic year. This year there were 615 eligible applicants for these grants. According to the National Endowment, applications were examined for intellectual quality, significance of their topics and the relevance of the project to the applicants' teaching responsibilities.

Mrs. Barnes will spend this next year studying the relationship between the Soviet system of government and Soviet society. She will also work with Prof. Michael Hanum, whose specialty is the Soviet Union, and may travel to the Soviet Union for some first-hand observations next year. Mrs. Barnes' students will also greatly benefit from this award. At the end of her sabbatical, Mrs. Barnes will return to her classroom and share her increased knowledge with her students.

It was no accident that Lois Barnes was selected for this honor. Previously, Mrs. Barnes has participated in the Fulbright summer seminar in India, a study program at the Japan Institute for Social and Economic Affairs and a James Madison fellowship to study the United States Constitution at Indiana University.

I believe that Mrs. Lois Barnes is a fine example of the quality of the teachers in Kentucky and the United States. I encourage my colleagues to read this article and to join me in congratulating this outstanding teacher.

The article follows:

FRANKLIN COUNTY TEACHER WINS PAID SABBATICAL

(By Elaine Walker)

FRANKFORT.—Elementary and secondary school teachers seldom get the opportunity for a paid sabbatical. But as Kentucky's recipient of the National Endowment for the Humanities Teacher-Scholar Award for 1989, Lois Barnes of Versailles will have that chance.

Fifty three teachers—one from each state, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico and the U.S. Virgin Islands—were announced yesterday as recipients of the grants, which are sponsored by the endowment and Reader's Digest. Each teacher will spend the 1989-90 school year doing an independent study project on a topic of his choice in the humanities.

"This is the kind of thing teachers just don't have the time to do as much as we'd like to," Mrs. Barnes said. "With lesson plans, grading papers and co-curricular activities, it's difficult to keep up with changes in our field."

Mrs. Barnes, who usually teaches history at Western Hills High School in Franklin County, will spend the year studying the relationship of the Soviet system of government to various aspects of Soviet society. She will receive a stipend of $27,500 from the foundation to replace her salary.

The endowment had 615 eligible applicants from the United States and 12 from Kentucky. The applications were judged on intellectual quality, the significance of their topics and the relevance of the project to the applicant's teaching responsibilities, said John McGrath, spokesman for the endowment.

This year, Mrs. Barnes is working as an assistant principal, but after her sabbatical, she will return to the classroom so she can apply her research. Most of her research will be geared toward improving her international relations class and strengthening her teaching, she said.

"I hope to update the materials for my class, discover new readings to share with my students and devise case studies comparing our system and theirs," Mrs. Barnes said.

She will begin her studies with a thorough reading of the Soviet Constitution and interpretations. Her research will include history and current Soviet issues.

"To understand the changes that are happening now, I need more background on what was," Mrs. Barnes said.

Western Hills will receive $500 from the endowment, which Mrs. Barnes can use to upgrade the materials for her international relations course.

While doing her research, Mrs. Barnes will work with Michael Hamm, history professor and department chairman at Centre College in Danville. His specialty is the Soviet Union.

She plans to travel with Hamm and some of his students to the Soviet Union next year if he makes the trip.

This is not the first time Mrs. Barnes has been selected for special programs. She participated in a Fulbright Summer Seminar in India, a study program at the Japan Institute for Social and Economic Affairs and a James Madison Fellowship to study the U.S. Constitution at Indiana University.

Fred Simpson, principal at Western Hills, said he thought the knowledge Mrs. Barnes gained would be put to good use in the chassroom.

"Lois is always looking for ways to improve her class and things to use in class," he said. "Of all the people I would select (she'll probably put this to more use than anyone I could send*"●

MAYOR SUSAN BASS LEVIN, RECIPIENT OF THE B'NAI B'RITH COMMUNITY SERVICE AWARD FROM TEMPLE BETH SHOLOM

● Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise to honor Susan Bass Levin, mayor of the township of Cherry Hill, JJ. On April 2, 1989, she will receive the B'nai B'rith Community Service Award from Temple Beth Sholom in Cherry Hill.

Mayor Levin is no stranger to hard work and achievement. She graduated from the University of Rochester, as a member of Phi Beta Kappa. A graduate of the George Washington University School of Law, she was a member of the Law Review and received the Order of the Coif.

For the past 12 years, Mayor Levin has practiced law with a partnership in the firm of Levin & Levin. She was a clerk to a Federal judge, an associate with Covington & Burling for 3 years and a professor at the Paralegal Institute of Philadelphia.

In addition to her outstanding legal career, she has devoted considerable time to community endeavors. For many years she has been involved in charitable work and community service. Her efforts include the Allied Jewish Appeal (Budget and Human Resources Committees, Women's Cabinet), the National Council of Jewish Women, Congregation M'Kor Shalom, and Hadassah. She served as State president of the New Jersey Association of Women Business Owners and as southern region president. She is a member of the Cherry Hill Chamber of Commerce, the Cherry Hill Unit of the American Heart Association and founding president in 1987.

She served as vice chairman of the New Jersey Coalition of Small Business Organizations, and on the Cherry Hill Cable TV Advisory Board. She is on the board of trustees of Family Focus of Cherry Hill, a nonprofit organization that helps teenagers. She has been honored by the Camden County Girl Scouts and the New Jersey Association of Women Business Owners.

But despite her deep community and charitable involvement, she wanted to contribute more. In 1985, she began her career in electoral office when she was elected to the township council. In 1986, she was elected president of the council and elected mayor of the township of Cherry Hill in 1987.

The township of Cherry Hill is fortunate to have such a dedicated public servant as its mayor. She is a most deserving recipient of the B'nai B'rith Community Service Award. I extend my heartiest congratulations to her on this occasion and my best wishes to her husband Benjamin and daughters, Lisa and Amy, and wish her continued success and happiness in the future.●

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, February 24 marked the 71st anniversary of the proclamation of Estonian Independence in 1918.

Estonia, once a free and independent nation, recognized by the United States and a member of the United Nations, has been illegally occupied by the Soviet Union since 1940. Only 19 years after Estonia was guaranteed sovereignty by the Soviet Union in the 1920 Treaty of Tartu, its fate was reversed by the secret protocols of the 1939 Molotov-Ribbentrop Pact between Stalinist Russia and Nazi Germany, which allowed for Soviet occupation of the Baltic States. Following the brutal Soviet invasion of 1940, Estonia was stripped of her political, religious, and economic freedoms. Nearly half a century of Soviet occupation, however, has failed to destroy the nationalist spirit of the Estonian people as they persist in clinging to their own unique language, history, and cultural heritage.

During 1988, the challenges facing Soviet authorities from the Estonian people intensified. The political activity of the Estonian people, their demands for reform, democracy, and outright independence, are unprecedented. Fully one-third of the population attended a rally September 17, while 900,000 signed a petition opposing proposed Soviet constitutional changes as undemocratic and harmful to Estonian interests. National and local groups and organizations, representing a variety of approaches but united in their final objective, continue to form.

Perhaps the biggest challenge to Soviet rule in the Estonian Republic was the formation last year of the Estonian National Independence Party—the first independent political party in the Soviet Union, whose purpose is to promote human rights and self-determination in Estonia.

Today, the party is thriving, despite the fact that Soviet authorities have stated that they will not tolerate any show of nationalist sentiment, as demonstrated by the explusion from Estonia last year of two of the party's founders and the imprisonment of top party officials.

On January 21, 1989, the Estonian National Independent Party announced its intent to boycott the elections to the Supreme Soviet on the grounds that the Soviet's indirect process of voting is undemocratic and prevents independent parties and groups from competing with the Communist Party on an equal footing.

The Estonian people have taken other unprecedented steps in recent months. On November 16, 1988, the Estonian Parliament asserted its right to veto Soviet statutes which it opposes. In the spirit of glasnost, Mr. Gorbachev has "recognized" this demand.

Although this is a step in the right direction, the goals of Estonian nationalists will remain unfulfilled until the illegal occupation by the Soviet Union has ended and Estonian sovereignty is restored.

Estonians have been prompted to act by the growing awareness that their very survival as a people is threatened by the continued Soviet occupation and colonization of their homeland. As its Independence Party declared:

> We do not have enough clean air, water or earth to sustain life, let alone freedom. * * * Add to that the danger of becoming a minority in our own ancient land.

The Estonian people yearn once again to control their own economy and natural resources, to decide their own internal affairs, their own destiny. And so, they continue to push peacefully for further reforms and democratization. Counting on continued moral and real support from the free world, Estonians are proceeding with careful, measured steps to move away from Moscow's control and toward true sovereignty. The Estonian people must know that we support them in their struggle for freedom.●

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Monday, March 6, 1989

The House met at 12 noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James David Ford, D.D., offered the following prayer:

At the beginning of this new day, O God, with all the potential for failure or success, for losing opportunities or doing the works of justice, may we recall Your promises to sustain us by Your spirit and to share with us Your vision of a new and better way. As we have been the recipients of the gift of time, may we use that gift to serve the people about us, to treat each other with the respect every person is due, and always and everywhere, to be appreciative of the beauty and wonder of this day of life and of grace. In Your name, we pray. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Pursuant to clause 1, rule I, the Journal stands approved.

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from California [Mr. LANTOS] kindly lead our colleagues in the Pledge of Allegiance.

Mr. LANTOS led the Pledge of Allegiance as follows:

I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one nation, under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

A message from the Senate by Mr. Lundregan, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolutions and a concurrent resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S.J. Res. 25. Joint resolution to designate the week of May 7, 1989, through May 14, 1989, as "Jewish Heritage Week";

S.J. Res. 39. Joint resolution to designate April 6, 1989, as "National Student-Athlete Day";

S.J. Res. 44. Joint resolution designating the week of April 9, 1989, as "Crime Victims Week";

The message also announced that pursuant to section 201(a)(2) of Public Law 93-344, the Chair announces on behalf of the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the appointment of Dr. Robert D. Reischauer as Director of the Congressional Budget Office for the term of office beginning on January 3, 1987, to take effect on March 6, 1989.

TIME TO END THE VIOLENCE IN TIBET

(Mr. LANTOS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, over the weekend we have witnessed another wave of tragic violence engulfing Lhasa, the capital of Tibet. Scores were killed and hundreds more were wounded as Chinese police, armed with the notorious AK-47 automatic rifle, suppressed yet another effort of Tibetans struggling to preserve their cultural and religious identity.

I call on the Government of China to commence—without delay—direct, face-to-face talks with the Dalai Lama and his representatives in order to resolve this long-festering and escalating issue in a constructive and peaceful fashion.

The Dalai Lama—a man of peace, prudence, and conciliation—is the only person who can diffuse this tragic and explosive situation in a way that will protect the internal autonomy and the human rights of the people of Tibet while recognizing China's security interests in the Tibet region.

COMMITTEE URGED TO VETO EMERGENCY BOARD IN EASTERN AIRLINES LABOR DISPUTE

(Mr. MICHEL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I understand that tomorrow the House Public Works Committee is planning to take up legislation requiring establishment of an emergency board in the Eastern Airlines labor dispute.

Reporting out such legislation would be the wrong course to take, and I hope the committee will think twice before moving in that direction.

The strike against Eastern, if it is limited to Eastern, is not a national emergency. And I have to applaud organized labor for thus far not engaging in any secondary picketing and boycotts designed to expand the strike and disrupting the Nation's commerce.

If Congress were to mandate an emergency board, it would send a signal at the outset of a new administration that the Federal Government will become an arbitrator of last resort in contract negotiations.

We all know what happens then. Everybody postures to better position themselves for a Government decision, rather than seriously trying to reach an agreement, and Congress gets dragged into the middle of this dispute or that dispute. It is easy to forget, because of the absence of such during the Reagan years, that this was rather commonplace in the sixties and seventies.

If the Eastern strike should spread and involve secondary boycotts—which I sincerely hope it does not—the President has legislation ready to ban such boycotts, and I will be the first to introduce it in the House.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, DC,

The Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

APPOINTMENT AS MEMBERS OF NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMISSION ON LAW ENFORCEMENT

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Honorable ROBERT H. MICHEL:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, March 2, 1989.

Hon. JIM WRIGHT,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

LIMITING FEDERAL DEPOSIT INSURANCE

(Mr. PEASE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, last week I introduced the Federal Deposit Insurance Reform Act of 1989, which will limit Federal deposit insurance to $100,000 on a per person basis or total deposit basis.

Federal deposit insurance has been an important stabilizing aspect of American depository institutions since the financially turbulent days of the Great Depression; however, the current savings and loan crisis and costs coupled with the FDIC's first ever fiscal year loss in 1988 have shed light upon an increasingly flawed and abused aspect of our deposit insurance system. This is the unlimited nature of Federal deposit insurance coverage.

Since deposits are currently insured up to $100,000 on a per account basis, any ceiling on deposit insurance coverage can be easily circumvented by opening additional accounts of $100,000 or less. My bill would curtail this limitless Federal insurance coverage by applying the $100,000 insurance limit on a per person basis.

Such a reform would result in numerous positive developments. It would alter the current deposit insurance system's risk-promoting incentive structure which has substantially contributed to the exorbitant and everincreasing S&L bailout costs. It would prevent the future abuse of the Federal Government's guarantee on deposits by curtailing the practices of individuals and corporations whose total insured deposits greatly exceed $100,000, and it would reduce Government financial liability by limiting the future growth of insurable deposits. Presently, the U.S. Government guarantees approximately 3 trillion dollars' worth of deposits—an astronomical and evergrowing sum.

Clearly, the taxpayers of this country deserve not only financial solutions to the FSLIC crisis, but structural reforms which will insure that such a costly crisis does not recur. The Federal Deposit Insurance Reform Act of 1989 is a major step in the right direction of achieving this goal. Therefore, I urge the support of my colleagues in making this reform a reality.

CONTINUE THE DIALOG ON UNITED STATES/SOVIET TRADE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. STARK] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I recently submitted several statements into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, asking for the beginning of a national dialog on United States/Soviet trade relations. Today, I would like to submit a statement by the National Conference on Soviet Jewry on this issue.

STATEMENT

NEW YORK, January 10, 1989.—The National Conference on Soviet Jewry (NCSJ), and its constituent agencies, as a united community, are currently reviewing and assessing US-Soviet trade policy in acknowledgment of positive changes for Soviet Jews, and most notably the increase in Jewish emigration and steps towards improving the (cultural and religious) rights of the Soviet Jewry minority.

Deliberations will continue by the constituent agencies in their own forums and with the NCSJ with the objective of developing and planning calibrated, united action in the near future.

This statement was adopted at a meeting convened by the National Conference on Soviet Jewry and followed presentations by Mark Talisman, Council of Jewish Federations, Phil Baum, American Jewish Congress, Dr. William Korey, International Council of B'nai B'rith, and Edgar Bronfman, World Jewish Congress.

Agencies present were: American Israel Public Affairs Committee, American Jewish Committee, American Jewish Congress, Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, B'nai B'rith International, B'nai B'rith Women, Coalition to Free Soviet Jews, Council of Jewish Federations, Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, Free Sons of Israel, Hadassah, Jewish National Fund, National Council of Jewish Women, National Council of Young Israel, National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council, Rabbinical Council of America, Union of American Hebrew Congregations, Women's American ORT, and World Jewish Congress.

STATEMENT ON UNITED STATES-SOVIET TRADE ADOPTED BY NCSJ'S BOARD OF GOVERNORS

WASHINGTON, DC, February 1, 1989.—At a meeting of the Board of Governors of the National Conference on Soviet Jewry (NCSJ) today, the following statement was unanimously agreed upon:

"The NCSJ will continue its process of assessing our position vis-a-vis U.S.-Soviet trade policy, looking toward a new policy in the near future if emigration, and the climate in which it functions, are sustained."

The NCSJ represents 47 national Jewish organizations and 300 local Jewish federations and community councils.

SOVIET JEWRY AND THE TRADE COMPONENT

HISTORY OF THE JACKSON-VANIK AMENDMENT

Section 402 to the Trade Act of 1974, known as the Jackson-Vanik Amendment, was first proposed by Senator Henry M. Jackson in response to an exorbitant education tax established by the USSR to halt, primarily, the emigration of Jews from that country. It was later co-sponsored by Representative Charles Vanik. After passage by an overwhelming majority of both houses of the Congress, it was signed into law by President Gerald Ford January 3, 1975 as the Freedom of Emigration Amendment to the Trade Reform Act.

The law applies to all communist countries ("non-market" economies), and provides that MFN ("Most-Favored-Nation" tariff status), and US government credits and guarantees, will be withheld from any "non-market" country, until the President determines that the country neither denies its citizens the right or opportunity to emigrate, nor imposes an excessive exit tax to limit (or exploit) emigration. (In East Europe, Hungary, Poland, Romania and Yugoslavia have been granted MFN status, at various times.)

Following extensive negotiations, Secretary of State Henry Kissinger and Senator Jackson exchanged letters on October 18, 1974, outlining assurances on specific liberalized emigration practices, which Kissinger stated he had received from the Soviets. Partially due to these assurances, the amendment was altered to allow an eighteen-month waiver, renewable annually, provided that the President:

(a) certifies to Congress that granting the waiver will promote the objective of free emigration, and

(b) that he has received assurances from the country receiving the waiver that its emigration practices will be substantially liberalized.

A separate amendment to the Export-Import Bank bill introduced by Senator Adlai Stevenson III in December 1974, set a $300 million ceiling on US backed credits to the USSR, over a four-year period. While not part of the Jackson-Vanik Amendment, and not necessarily in accord with the sponsors' goals, it was interpreted by the Administration, and later by Soviet officials, as being tied together.

NCSJ POSITION

The Jewish community view is that many aspects of a US-USSR relationship hold a potential for Jewish emigration activists. Trade links between the two countries, among other bilateral ties, offer special hope to those struggling to be repatriated to Israel, and to rejoin their families. The prevalent view is that future efforts to enlarge trading activity between the US and the Soviet Union should reflect an understanding of the reciprocal obligations involved, including the protection of human rights.

The basic objective of the amendment, as a tangible legislative expression of support for human rights, still has widespread support as long as the USSR desires US credits to purchase American technology, or seeks to expand exports to this country.

According to the original sponsors, and their supporters, the Jackson-Vanik Amendment was not meant to block trade with any country, but to give it a "human dimension." Later, Senator Jackson was to explain that the amendment was "not locked in concrete," since it was designed to facilitate emigration.

The current view is that a sustained and significant increase in emigration, with the positive resolution of the cases of long-term refuseniks, would provide an opportunity for the President to make the required report on emigration to Congress, enabling him to waive the restrictions of the Jackson-Vanik Amendment for the initial eighteen-month period. At the end of that time there would be an assessment to determine continued compliance and eligibility for further annual extensions.

SENATE—Monday, March 6, 1989

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 3, 1989)

The Senate met at 12 noon, on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the Honorable JOSEPH I. LIEBERMAN, a Senator from the State of Connecticut.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him.—James 1:5.

Commit thy works unto the Lord, and thy thoughts shall be established.—Proverbs 16:3.

Eternal God, our Father, mighty in wisdom, power and love, grant to Thy servants, the Senators, a special measure of grace as they approach the lonely moment of decision. Illumine their minds and hearts with the true light that, with cool heads and warm hearts, they will reach the decisive moment. As debate ceases, final counsel is given and each stands alone with his conscience, remind them of Your presence, Your readiness to give wisdom. Establish their thoughts and grant to each the integrity to declare his conviction.

We ask this in the name of truth incarnate. Amen.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WIRTH). Without objection, it is so ordered.

ABORTION REJECTED, SON LIVES

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, about a month ago, I received a copy of a letter to the editor written by Karen Kolbinsky, of Hillsborough, NC. The newspaper—the Durham Herald—headed Karen Kolbinsky's letter, "Abortion Rejected, Son Lives."

Like most Senators, I read countless letters to the editor in various papers each year. But, Mr. President, this letter was different. It discussed—in a very personal way—a woman's rejection of abortion.

Mrs. Kolbinsky's story is not unique. She became pregnant at an early age while she was in school. Her father and friends recommended abortion, but after serious consideration she decided to let her baby live.

What was unique about her letter, Mr. President, is the parallel Mrs. Kolbinsky draws between America's current treatment of another minority—the unborn child. Just as the law did not provide full legal protection to native Americans during an earlier era, we are now turning our backs on the most innocent and vulnerable of humanity—the unborn child.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the letter by Karen Kolbinsky which was printed in the February 6 editions of the Durham Morning Herald be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Durham Morning Herald, Feb. 6, 1989]

ABORTION REJECTED, SON LIVES

Thirteen years ago I faced one of the most difficult decisions of my life. While I was a student in nursing school, I conceived my first child. Carrying the baby to term meant giving up a promising career and facing an uncertain future.

Many people, including my doctor and my father, encouraged me to consider abortion as an alternative to having my baby. The "Roe vs. Wade" decision had made the issue of abortion a legal option for women in my situation only three years earlier. I doubt that any of us would ever have considered that alternative if I had been pregnant in 1972, but it did seem like the quickest and easiest solution to my immediate problem. The pressure I felt from school, realizing I would not be able to support a child if I quit, the constant morning sickness, it was all adding up.

A friend in school suggested that I think carefully about both sides of the abortion issue before making a final decision. The real question wasn't if it was my right to choose abortion, but, "Is it right?" I had never taken the time to think it through. She didn't want me to make a decision out of desperation.

I had argued that since it was legal, it must be "right." She gently reminded me that slavery had once been legal. "Whatever you decide," she said, "You will have to live with your decision the rest of your life. Just be sure."

I am from Native American ancestry, so I am extra sensitive about things like "human rights". At one time the Constitution of the United States gave white people the legal "right" to shoot and kill any Native Americans that were found outside reservation territory.

The logic behind that (seeing it is an obvious violation of another "right" that entitles all people equally to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness) was to label Native Americans as "savage", making them "non-Human". That is offensive to me. I am really quite human, and I don't think I am part "savage". It is amazing to me that a civilized nation with educated leaders made such unjust decisions.

It was a question on a test I received at school that prompted me to probe deeper, before I acted thoughtlessly out of mere emotion and comfort for myself. The question was "When does life begin?" I answered "At birth". My instructor marked it wrong. She wrote beside my answer "Life begins at conception."

By some strange twist of fate, we were studying obstetric nursing at that point in school. I studied the photos of growing babies in utero, and I realized how necessary it is for human life to go through the initial growth stages in the protective surrounding of a mother's womb.

Until life begins, there is no growth. It is the life within the fetus that causes her to grow into the next stage of human development, what we call an infant. Without life, the baby stops growing. That is what we commonly call "death". The mother's body casts off the dead body. This is what the medical definition of abortion is. "Premature termination of pregnancy." Abortion stops the life and growth of a baby human. Labeling her a "fetus" is no different than calling a Native American a "savage." It doesn't change the fact. It is the only way a nation that professes itself to be civilized can deal with the reality of the situation, that they are slaughtering innocent human beings. I have had to ask myself a question in light of all of this. "Who are the real savages?"

I chose to keep my baby, to suffer the natural results of my own wrong choices and careless actions, and to experience the wonder and miracle of life growing within me. I had the joy of giving life to a beautiful son.

Today, because I chose to let him go on living and growing naturally, he continues to grow into adolescence and, hopefully, he will survive to reach adulthood. He plans to be a physician and to work in a third world country some day. He has been moved to compassion by seeing pictures of starving and dying children. In school, he has received awards nearly every year since he started as outstanding in both academics and character. My husband and I, and our four other children, love him very much.

He has made a valuable contribution to our family and to society in his short life already.

What a waste it would have been to have robbed our planet of this precious life.

KAREN KOLBINSKY.

HILLSBOROUGH.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair notes that the time for morning business has expired.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the hour of 12:30 having arrived, the Senate will go into executive session to resume consideration of the nomination of John G. Tower to be Secretary of Defense.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I thank my colleagues. I do wish to address the issue of the Tower nomination and lend my support to our colleague, John Tower, and to the President.

There has been a great deal of discussion about this one, a great bit of painful dialog, a great bit of pain, in my mind, because we are putting a test on here that we have never put on before. That is very disturbing. It should be disturbing not just to us and those with checkered careers of the past, but to any citizen of the United States. Because John Tower—amid many other things, to all of us who know him—we know there is not a single person in this Chamber who does not know him to be an exceedingly capable individual. He is bright, witty, intelligent, articulate. He may be feared by some here because of his knowledge of defense, because he knows the issue better than most of us who sit here, without question.

It is funny because that part of his talent and ability has all been foreshadowed by this heap of trash that has been shoveled on him. It is disturbing to me because we have not addressed how John Tower would perform as Secretary of Defense with his awesome skills, abilities and knowledge. He has dealt with arms control issues and chaired the Armed Services Committee that our fine friend SAM NUNN now chairs. He knows the game better than anybody in the United States, and we are going to now slip him over the side of the ship with full flag and taps. Boy, that is something to watch.

He has proved his ability time and time again to deal with defense-related issues, in his role in the past administration and in his continued services in the private sector. He knows every facet of the military. He served in the Navy as an enlisted man and a chief petty officer. That experience was valuable to a man who rose to the chairmanship of the Senate Armed Services Committee. He stayed in the Reserves. We have heard all those things.

In 1965, he waded into the defense budget and the defense strategy debate with relish. It should not be ignored that it was John Tower who helped shape the defense policy and defense budget of the United States for 20 years. As to his work in Geneva, in accordance with his own statements and those of Max Kampelman, he was a superb and conciliatory agent of progress on the INF Treaty.

He went off from the Senate and continually demonstrated his competence. Now there are those who want to challenge that aspect of his life with allegations about personal problems and "impaired capability"—a wonderful euphemism.

I said it disturbed me about the ties with the defense establishment in these recent years. John Tower then assured me, as is his wont, that he would recuse himself, remove himself from anything that had to do with those companies that would have to do with suspension and debarment of contracts—more than the statute would have required.

But it is so extraordinary that we see this man in this extremity. His colleagues have never mentioned his lack of competence. Just the opposite. They have detailed his command of the facts, his ability, his eloquence to articulate ideas, his political skill in carrying out the Republican defense agenda. I have seen a number of pitched battles and debates about various Republican nominees. I have witnessed the sharks as they have circled around Jim Watt, Anne Burford, Ed Meese, Robert Bork, others. This is a strange town. I have said it before, it is filled with organizations who are there to protect every living thing—every bird, beast, snail, tree, pine cone, whatever. Give them another human being to gnaw on and they just chew them up and spit them out. And here we go on another one of those.

We have all seen how we feed on each other. We do it. I am involved. I am not saying that I am sitting out of the loop. The Senate, the public and the media are also involved. Right at this minute they are just out there in the hall running around with their pads wondering if they can work up anything or find out anything. I do not blame them. It is the only game in town, and it is a feeding frenzy which often becomes erratic and unfortunate.

But I have never seen the circumstances similar to the current willingness of all my Senate colleagues to base their opinions of John Tower upon such flimsy and easily refutable evidence. It is a curious spectacle we are witnessing, like watching John Tower get pecked to death by ducks.

Some Senators suggest that he should withdraw his name from consideration for the Secretary of Defense. Yet, there is surely something that gnaws on the bosom of all of us on that one and that is this: How do I put my reputation back together? How do I do that when I pick up the paper and my daughters pick up the papers and read about the alleged Russian ballerina dancing on the piano and doing a strip on the side? That is totally phony. It is a fake. It is a fantasy of some guy who decided to put it in there, and tried to get away with anonymity—and, by George, they are getting away with it.

The fellow who put forth that allegation about the ballerina is some fellow who has four aliases and is doing everything possible to remain an anonymous accuser. I think that is cheap. I would love to debate that dude, drag him out wherever he is. Let him sidle up to the bar and put his poke out there. Go up into room 407—many of you cannot—but those of you who could—should and would see for yourself "T-4," "T-3," who are they? I do not know who they are. But I do know one thing, if you think that is good enough for John Tower, think how you would like it for yourself because that is what is next.

These allegations are then most difficult to rebut because the FBI report is classified. Then the FBI goes back and interviews some of those witnesses, and we find they then had a different view of the allegations which they had previously given. They did not like the heat when people came and said, "Did you say that?" "Well, no, I didn't see it but I heard about it," or "I thought I saw it."

Then the one the other day which even the fine chairman of the committee, SAM NUNN, rejected. That was the trash from the man Jackson because it was not corroborated, and there it is on the front page of the Washington Post leaked by none other than a handy dandy staff member who will also remain anonymous and continue to haul his coal around in this place while the rest of us try to do our business one on one.

I learned that one around here, when you have business to do, you have to go find your colleagues or else the staff will just detonate you somewhere along the line and you will not know where the snares are. You go up to your friend on the other side of the aisle and say, "Hey, I thought you were aboard with me on this one?" They say, "I am." And you say, "Not according to your staff."

They are carrying their own agenda. One staff member had his own agenda. He apparently hired an aircraft, paid for by the taxpayers, to fiddle this report on down to our friend, the chairman, who was participating in a charity which I also happened to involve myself in over the years.

What in the hell is wrong with Federal Express? Did that break down? But that goes with the ego of staff. They get in this place and their ego overpowers their brains.

So that is also tedious to watch. The American people ought to start watching that one, too. So what choices do public figures have in America when they are creamed in the press and their reputations are out there on the line? Should they then suddenly drop out? I cannot speak for anyone else, but I tell you, I am a scrapper. Many of us in this Chamber are scrappers or we would not be here. John Tower is a scrapper, too. I would never walk away from this one. I would never walk away from innuendo and petty people and goofy witnesses trying to bring me down—witnesses interviewed by the FBI who change their story. And I respect John Tower for resisting these efforts to sully his reputation.

Sure, the administration made mistakes in these early days of office. Who is seeking perfection? We do not have it in our own lives. Why should we have it here? In fact, the people whose lives are most out of control expect us to do the heavy lifting for them. That is a curious thing, too. I think it was a mistake that they had a White House meeting without having the chairman of the committee there and the other Democrats, but it might have been something they did not think through. It is still possible in the human condition. It does not mean it was contrived and evil. Surely a mistake.

Maybe John Tower's nomination should have been sent to the Senate in a more timely fashion. I can agree. But it is not the administration's fault that certain Members of the Senate have targeted John Tower for destruction because of their own personal whimsey or hidden agendas or partisanship. The credibility of the Senate as a fair and honest institution is what is involved in this debate. That is what is going to suffer if the efforts to undermine John Tower with dubious testimony of the most wretched variety and rumor continue. That would be truly unfortunate.

I practiced law for 18 years in the town of Cody, WY, and I never saw evidence like this that could send a guy to the clink or dispose of him. They would laugh it out of court. On cross-examination they would punch holes in those cats. There would not be anything left of them, these anonymous, marvelous citizens who have come forth.

Some say that Senate Democrats are anxious to deal President Bush a defeat in order to establish early on their dominance over the President. I do not know. I do not believe that. I think it is extreme. It is a surprising thought in light of the fact that President Bush has just expressed his willingness to work closely with the Congress in a spirit of cooperation. Our majority leader, whom I will be backing, I am sure, more times that I will ever be resisting, is setting his whole foundation as leader based on fairness, and he will prevail on that score. GEORGE MITCHELL will be a good majority leader because he is fair. That is his nature. And SAM NUNN is fair. But if the Senate rejects the nomination of John Tower, it is going to be on a party line vote. Sure, one or two who may be from different parties will switch sides. It is going to set a tone. I do not think it will be a long diversion. We will get through it. It may very well set a partisan tone for a time—I hope not—but we will get through that, too. But one day, all should remember, the shoe will be on the other foot.

I think it was my fine friend Senator WALLOP in this debate who said Members of Congress are demanding the privilege of back seat drivers. I think not only are they indulging in back seat driving but they are also trying to reach over the seat and grab the wheel and even run the pedals. That makes for a rather erratic course, an unreasonable and dangerous activity. So those of us on this side of the aisle find that behavior most disturbing and so should the American public.

If John Tower's nomination is defeated by the Senate, there would be losers only, no winners. We will all lose because the standards we are mustering up to judge this nominee are becoming increasingly arbitrary and petty and capricious. The guest column in the New York Times by Anthony Dolan says, "Even those without the usual quotient of compassion seem to sense that once allegations of wild nights in the big city enter the public arena, the wounds are likely to go deep, retaliation will follow and civility will suffer."

I agree. Mr. Dolan also reminds us that individuals who, "while keeping all the rules, also keep track how others are doing," are not without sin themselves. John Tower has already confronted all the allegations made against him, has admitted he did these things in 1970 and then to go back and trot out what happened in 1970 as if it happened last month is unfair and a cheap shot. He said he did maybe "drink a little scotch" in the seventies. Those are things he admitted to, things that happened and they are not so now. It is fascinating to me as to just who are these appointed scorekeepers in society now, and in the Senate. I have learned to handle that quite well. When they ask me a goofy question, I say, "What did you do when you were 20 or 25 or 30?" When we start asking the examiners the same question they ask the examinees, we will make some progress in the country. Some of the questions you would not even deign to think of answering. And yet if we ask it of them, they say, "Well, I am not a public figure." Then we say, "That is great. Yet people read more about you than they do about us."

So there is a peril coming here that is unseen. It is good to see all these remarkable people surface but I ask you, could they pass the test? I doubt that very sincerely. I know some of them and the way they lead their lives. And so we are going to be asked to deal with this again and again in here. We have never done that before. It has reached a point of true absurdity. And yet we know of instances where our colleagues on both sides of the aisle have been destroyed by this type of overzealousness. Where does it stop? My colleague from Maine and I were talking the other day of the day we were sworn in as Members of this Chamber. BILL COHEN and I were saying that on that occasion one of the Members of this body came into the Chamber best described as drunk, and quickly colleagues on both sides of the aisle gathered around him and ushered him very tenderly from the Chamber. There was no discussion. I remember SAM NUNN was standing there. I remember TED STEVENS and other senior colleagues just gently took him from the Chamber. I remember that very graphically, and that man later went on to generate his own self-esteem to join Alcoholics Anonymous and is still a productive member of society. He was a tremendous Senator, respected throughout the United States and the world.

So where does it stop? In the Senate we have to, obviously, judge others. That is our duty in advise and consent. However, we should never seek out these opportunities in such a public setting where the evidence is so obviously flimsy and fragile and unsupportive of all these various anonymous allegations that have floated around in recent days. I earnestly appeal to all of my colleagues not to fall prey to the temptation to vote against John Tower because it is the "easy thing to do." It would not be an easy thing to explain to his constituents who, after all, have read the tragically incorrect tales of bogus allegations in the local Times or Tribune, and they never get corrected. I strongly urge all of my colleagues to walk a mile in John Tower's shoes before they cast a vote against him based on the testimony I have seen—testimony of some waiter in a local restaurant, some flight attendant on an aircraft, or the fantasies and hysteria of some mystery witness. None of you could pass that test. John Tower has been tried in a court without the rules of evidence. I trust we will overturn the verdict of that court and move as we should and vote as we should in support of President George Bush's selection.

I ask unanimous consent that an editorial from this morning's Washington Post be printed in the RECORD, a powerful piece indeed. I urge the reading of it. I thank the Chair.

There being no objection, the article was ordered printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 6, 1989]

THE TOWER DEBATE

Just a few days into the Senate debate on the fitness of John Tower to be secretary of defense—never mind that it already seems like a few years—a couple of things have emerged and some that were already known need restating. Of those that need restating, the first is that Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Sam Nunn is an honorable and serious man who, in opposing the confirmation of former senator Tower, is acting out of conviction and deserves to be listened to with respect. He well understands the second of the truths that need restating—namely, that there is at least a heavy presumption that a president is entitled to the assistance of the Cabinet members of his choice, unless members of the Senate find truly disqualifying, as distinct from merely disagreeable or politically unsympathetic, behavior on the nominee's part.

Sen. Nunn believes that evidence of such disqualifying behavior has in fact been found, and most, perhaps all, of the Senate's Democrats seem prepared to support him in that finding. The trouble is that they have been unable to make that case except on the basis of 1) untested and unpublished allegations, which defenders of Mr. Tower who are privy to the same information challenge, and 2) an appraisal of Mr. Tower by standards that have not been invoked before. If the Senate is to reject Mr. Tower, it must do so on the basis of more solid information and more persuasive logic than it has presented to date. So far the case for rejection has not been made.

There are, of course, some procedural impediments to making it. Sen. Nunn has properly argued against the indiscriminate release of the kind of raw, unsworn and incompletely examined material that is the stuff of the FBI file in question. But where that leaves the rest of us is in the uncomfortable, in fact untenable, position of having to make our own assessment on the basis of which of the serious and generally trustworthy people on both sides of the argument to believe. They all go into fabled room 407 and either study or skim the charges of Mr. Tower's drinking and debauchery and then emerge to give us their assessments. But the public can elicit from them only the most rudimentary, is-it-bigger-than-a-breadbox understanding of the size and shape of the problem.

We have said before in this space that the possibility of a drink-impaired defense secretary is grounds for Senate rejection—no two ways about it, and we don't care what Abe Lincoln once said about General Grant or how many gallons of brandy Winston Churchill is reputed to have downed in a day. It does not shake us in that conviction either to note the absolutely awesome hypocrisy of many of the senators following Sam Nunn's lead, some who themselves have indulged the same appetites and habits that are at issue in the Tower nomination, and some who, while professing themselves unwilling to confirm a defense secretary with a history of heavy drinking, given his nuclear responsibilities, have worked arduously in the no-so-distant past for presidential candidates known to have this very disability.

So to us the alcohol charge is central. But an FBI file, no matter what its usual standing in preliminary White House choices of nominees, is not the right basis for making this decision, especially when straightforward and reliable members of the Senate disagree on its contents and implications. And this is all the more true when, by their own account, members of the Senate set such great store by the FBI file, invoking it as the source of their change of mind about Mr. Tower, whom they knew for years, approved for the arms negotiator job he not long ago held and apparently also for the defense secretary post until they came upon this material.

It is also true, as Mr. Tower's defenders argue, that many credible people in public life who have worked with Mr. Tower are willing to testify that they have not encountered the misconduct with which he is charged, while practically no one with a name is willing to come forward on the other side, despite the full, rich fare of anecdotes that is served up daily in this city by people who claim to know but who won't take public responsibility for the lore they privately share. We understand Mr. Nunn's explanation of why it was so difficult to try to work out a "sanitized" version of the FBI file and accept his account of steps taken to enable Mr. Tower more directly to confront the evidence against him on both "womanizing" and excessive drinking. But we do not think the possibilities have been exhausted for devising some techniques by which those who have been making the charges are made also to take responsibility for them, to come out in the open with their evidence so that it can be inspected and weighed by the public and defended against by Mr. Tower. You don't have to love Mr. Tower to believe that truly important values are at stake here.

One of these values is fairness, and here we come to the other large question, that of Mr. Tower's conduct in selling his insight and information to private defense contractors so immediately upon leaving his job as arms control negotiator in Geneva. We think it was rotten, undignified behavior. We also think it was just about par for the course in these matters. The hypocrisy on this question in fact rises to tidal-wave levels. Comparable things are done all across the board all the time in government, including by those who have just lost or given up a seat in Congress. Mr. Tower has not been accused of compromising classified information. If he had been shown to have done this, the answer would be easy. But rather he is charged with behavior that Congress has condoned in its own and on the part of nominees to the executive branch that it likes. Is there a new rule? Is it fixed? How should it affect other nominees now in line for confirmation in administration jobs? Will it be supported when some who are liked on the Hill but who have a similar history come before the Senate?

Sam Nunn has expressed publicly his own discomfort with some of the limitations of the confirmation process in this case. He must also be aware of the dangers inherent in it—the awful precedents established by such total reliance on the kind of material found in FBI files and even appearing to adjust the criteria for confirmation of presidential appointees in an arbitrary or political fashion. This is not his style and it is not the style of many of those serious folks in the Senate who are opposing John Tower. They owe it not just to Mr. Tower but to their own reputation to find a way to make the proceedings fairer, the standards clearer and the case—if they can—more credible.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, before my distinguished colleague departs, I have not as yet had the opportunity to read the Evans-Novak column here in the Post of today. I did take it upon myself at my own initiative to see Roland Evans and to tell him precisely what occurred, that is, to the extent I had knowledge on the subject, and I will not recount basically what I told Mr. Evans, and then I will later have the opportunity to read it and see if this article in any way reflects the information that I possessed.

Senator NUNN and I were together at this charity event. He was scheduled to leave the event and go on other prescheduled trips, thereby preventing his return to Washington. I was, however, and did return to Washington Monday after the weekend. Now, prior thereto Senator NUNN and I had both expressed to the White House our availability at the earliest possible time to look over the FBI material. We were told that as soon as it was available we would be notified.

Insofar as I know, the first knowledge of its availability came to the chairman while he was with me at this particular event. He pulled me aside out there and said that he had made arrangements for the FBI report to come out. As far as I know, the arrangements were made as is custom by the chief of the staff of the majority. I did not get involved in the details.

The report was brought out, Senator NUNN and I departed from the activities that we were scheduled to be involved in, and spent on Saturday, my rough estimate now is around 2 to 2½ hours looking at it Saturday evening—not late evening. I would somewhere in the area of 5:30 to 8:30 to 9.

We then recognized that we had to do a great deal of additional work. We got up around 7:15 the next morning, regrouped with a member of the White House counsel staff, a military aide, Mr. Punaro, and my chief of staff, Mr. Tucker. In my recollection we must have spent another 2½ to 3½ hours from say 7:30 on Sunday morning working on it.

There were two advantages to having the report being brought to us. A, it enabled us to look over that report and then advise White House counsel where we felt there were areas that required additional research. They took our request and initiated immediately the additional research under the aegis of the FBI.

Mr. NUNN then went on some scheduled trips elsewhere. I returned to Washington, continued to work with both majority and minority staff, then worked by telephone with Mr. NUNN throughout that week until he returned, and shortly after his return we resumed working with the FBI here in the Senate Armed Services Committee spaces.

I have not had an opportunity to read this through. I will, and I may have further comments later.

Mr. EXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I thank my friend and colleague from Virginia for the explanation that has just been offered. I would simply caution my good friend and colleague from Wyoming. If you do not believe everything that you read in the FBI report, do not necessarily believe that report is any more authoritative on some matters than the Evans-Novak story in the paper today.

I believe that the Senator from Virginia has highlighted what I was going to say in rebuttal to that charge.

I just say I think it is sad indeed that we feel it necessary to come on to the floor of the U.S. Senate and directly or indirectly impugn the motive of our colleagues. We all know this has been a very, very difficult task for all of us—the majority and the minority.

I just want to make it very clear that the facts of the matter are money was saved from taxpayers' expense in the way this was handled by the chairman of the committee which is customary because on that airplane that went out it was not just SAM NUNN's chief of staff for the committee, but there was the majority staff director, the minority staff director, and the White House lawyer that my friend from Virginia has already referred to who had to go along because it should be understood by now that the White House report is never given to a courier other than someone who has authority to handle the report. That is why the White House lawyer went along. In addition, there was a military escort that has been properly outlined by my colleague from Virginia.

So I think we can have our differences of opinion but how the report was carried out there and whether or not it was a good idea to take a military aircraft is not a valid point concerned. In fact, from that perspective, it has been brought out that was the cheapest way for this to be handled.

Also, as Senator WARNER has very well outlined, time was of the essence. This was on January 7. I remember it very well because I talked on the telephone with Senator NUNN that day in Phoenix or wherever he was. I do not remember where he was. He told me that Senator WARNER was there. I had received some information that I thought that it was critically important that I relate to the chairman. I did so over the telephone. He told me that the report was on its way out at that time, and that they were doing this so we could speed up the process because the record should show we were not scheduled to come back into session until January 20. I know Senator NUNN, and I suspect also that Senator WARNER, felt that the sooner they had the opportunity as the leaders of the committee to address this subject and study the report, get the process going, we would be better prepared when we finally did get back to call the full committee into session to discuss the nomination which we did.

Just one other point. I heard early about the charge of an Eastern-bloc woman and his relationship. I did not believe it at the time. I also heard some time before it broke in the press the episode about the drunken ballerina—supposedly—Soviet, and on top of the piano dancing. I did not believe that either. As it turned out, I think that the FBI report among other things closed an awful lot of loopholes with regard to allegations that were simply not accurate.

If I were the opposition to my position on the Tower nomination, I, too, would use these reports which are unfair, unfair to John Tower, unfair to the process. I too would use them in an attempt to imply that everything that we know about John Tower that possibly would not be shed in the best light follows the irresponsibility of those who made those accusations.

As I have said on many occasions, 90 percent of what I have heard and seen and studied on this matter is sheer garbage. Ten percent at least has given me grave pause for concern. And therefore I think it not accurate to assume that because there were unfortunate stories released to the press. This Senator can say that I have never released one shred of evidence to the press. And I have talked to lots of them. It is unfortunate that these come out. I feel sorry about that. But nevertheless the process has to go forward, and there are other things that cause me enough pause for concern that I am opposed to the nomination.

I yield the door.

Mr. SIMPSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. SIMPSON. Let me share with my colleague from Nebraska, who also came here when I did, that I enjoyed it very much although I know he harbors some deep feelings about lawyers that are very deep in his mind. I checked with him on that many, many times. And perhaps I misspoke. I read the report. Yet, just recently I also was the subject of a column of Evans and Novak where they said, "If Tower has friends like Simpson, who needs enemies?" At least I put in a letter to the editor saying they were about two tacos short of a combination plate. And I did hear from them. They are delightful people, elfish sometimes, you know; but it is not appropriate here, and I agree. I have done that.

So I did not know anything more than what I read. I appreciate, and I listened to what Senator WARNER has said. I would be very pleased to make an apology to the staff person that was mentioned in the article, and would ask for a report of it so that I might read that to see what the reasons for doing that were. I certainly owe the gentleman an apology. But I still leave in my comments about the generic aspects of staff participation, I will leave that in the RECORD, because sometimes we get overwhelmed by staff, and sometimes they take us to places we do not choose to go, and yet we have to take responsibility for that.

But the Senator from Nebraska is correct. I should at least ask that same thing that I am asking of them, and so I certainly apologize to that person. I would very much like to have a report of what did occur and why that was necessary. I, too, am sorry about what is happening; but even though the Senator from Nebraska and I can both be sorry, it is John Tower who suffers. That is the problem here.

And then to hear a startling statement, which I believe, because I, too, have matched the percentages, is that 90 percent of the material about John Tower is garbage and the other 10 percent might be true, Lord then where are we? How did we get here? Impossible, absolutely impossible.

Mr. EXON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. EXON. I thank my friend and colleague from Wyoming, and this is just parliamentary garbage or talk. I hold him in very high esteem. An apology is not necessary at all. I think that the remarks he made just had to be corrected and put into proper perspective, and that is what I attempted to do.

I yield the floor.

Mr. DANFORTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KOHL). The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a minute?

Mr. DANFORTH. I am happy to yield.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. President, just to clarify the record, there is no FBI report, as such. "Report" connotes that somehow the FBI has made an analysis of the various allegations and statements. The fact is, it is a compilation of statements made by witnesses to the FBI, but in no way should be construed as a substantive report which demands any sort of sanctity as to its truth or veracity or lack thereof.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. DANFORTH. I yield.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that immediately following my remarks relative to the Washington Post column of today, I might have the opportunity to provide some additional material in the form of some memoranda made up by the staff at the time this issue first arose some month or 6 weeks ago. I am not sure where it has been all this time.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESPONSE TO A QUESTION FROM MR. ROLAND EVANS

In response to a question in mid-January, 1989, from Mr. R. Evans about the use of a military aircraft to bring the FBI material to Senators NUNN and WARNER, the following reply was provided then:

On the evening of January 6, 1989, the White House transition and the Tower transition staff notified the Committee that the FBI materials were now available for review by Senators NUNN and WARNER. Both the White House and Tower transition staffs urged that the Senators review the materials immediately and wanted to fly the material to where the Senators were together in Phoenix.

The Senators would not be back in Washington together for over a week due to the Senate recess. The transition personnel urged that such a delay in reviewing the material be avoided. At approximately 10:00 p.m. on the evening of the 6th, a decision was made to get the materials to Phoenix.

The transition counsel required that the FBI material be brought to the Senators by transition personnel as the material could not be turned over to Committee custody.

One of the transition counsels, Ms. Sherrie Marshall, brought the material to Phoenix on January 7th. Both the Majority and Minority Staff Directors, Mr. Arnold Punaro and Mr. Pat Tucker, were also required by the Committee Leadership to be present. In addition, one person from OSD Legislative Affairs also went on the trip at the request of the Department of Defense.

Based on the Senator's review, there were a number of follow-ups for both the FBI as well as the Committee staff. The follow-up work was begun immediately upon the staff's return on January 8th.

After checking on commercial arrangements the staff made the decision to use military air to meet the schedule constraints and due to the number of travellers.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I should like to go back to the basics, what I consider to be the basic question that is before us. Let me first say what I think the basic question is not. I do not think the basic question before the Senate has anything to do about whether or not a staff person for the Armed Services Committee should or should not have flown in a military aircraft.

I do not believe that the basic question before us has anything to do with the chairman of the Armed Services Committee.

Some Senators have raised the question, some columnists have raised the question, it this some known partisan attack that has been made by the other side of the aisle and, particularly, by the Armed Services Committee? I do not believe that for a minute. I do not believe that one morning Senator NUNN woke up and rubbed his hands together and said to himself, "How can I get President Bush?" I do not think that.

I have discussed the nature of some of those comments with various friends of mine on the other side of the aisle, people I have worked with, and people I respect. I have said to them, "In your view, is this some kind of plot?" The assurance, over and over again is, no, it is the farthest thing from some kind of a plot. I do not think that is what is involved before us.

I must say that I also agree with a comment that was made by John Tower on a television talk show yesterday when he said that the issue really is not John Tower. I agree with that. I think there is something more basic that is before the Senate, and I should like to discuss that more basic question. The more basic question is, what is the role of the Senate? What is the role of the Senate in giving its advice and consent to a Presidential nominee? Then, even more generally than that, what is the role of the Senate in its relationship to the executive, to the President of the United States, in conducting matters relating to the foreign policy of this country?

So that is the nature of my remarks today, not so much John Tower, and certainly not SAM NUNN, but, rather, what is the role of the Senate? What should be our view of the role of the Senate, as we approach the question that we are going to vote on sooner or later?

I think the issue is the degree of deference that should be given by the Senate to Presidential nominees. Should we accord great deference to a Presidential nominee, or, instead, should we accord very little deference to a Presidential nominee? Should we, as individual Senators, go to the floor with the view that our position is just as sound as the position of the President of the United States and, therefore, we as Senators should be ready and able to substitute our opinions about Presidential nominations for the opinion of the President of the United States?

Mr. President, my good friend, fellow St. Louis Cardinal fan, and colleague on the Senate Commerce Committee, Senator EXON, is on the floor now. Yesterday, the John McLaughlin television program had a very interesting discussion with Senator WARNER and Senator EXON.

Senator EXON was quite clear in his statement. I should like to read just a short quote from the Senator from Nebraska, which was run yesterday on television, about the Tower nomination. Senator EXON said, "I asked myself, if I were President of the United States, and what I know now about John Tower and his possible shortcomings, with all of the great things that he has done, would I appoint him Secretary of Defense? And I had to conclude, unfortunately, to the contrary." Senator EXON's position as expressed on television yesterday was, whether he, if he were President of the United States, would nominate John Tower for Secretary of Defense.

I submit to the Senate that that is not the standard we should follow, and that that cannot be the standard we can follow, and that that has never been, to my knowledge, the standard the Senate has followed in voting on Presidential nominations for any office.

I should like to quote, in a similar vein, from an appearance on "Good Morning, America," last week, by Senator BREAUX of Louisiana.

Senator BREAUX said:

I mean, we ought to be looking for the very best that we can find in the Nation. The President has a right to go out and find that person, but the Senate has an obligation to determine whether, in fact, this is the best we can find out there in the whole country. It is more than just a question of having to prove a person incompetent. It really should be a question of, is this the most competent person that we can possibly find?

Is this the most competent person in the country that we can possibly find? Looking at the universe of possible nominees in a country of going on a quarter of a billion people now, is this the most competent person we can possibly find? Presumably, if this is to be the standard, then each of us, if we can think of somebody who is more competent, somebody who is better, as a nominee, according to this standard, should vote against the President's nominee.

Then, Mr. President, I was reading with great interest the committee report on the Tower nomination and I was surprised in reading the committee report to find something of a similar vein right on page 1 of the committee report where the Armed Services Committee says:

Although the responsibility for nominations rests primarily with the President, the Senate's constitutional power of advice and consent establishes a responsibility for the Armed Services Committee to ensure that the highest standards are applied in the appointment of the persons entrusted with the national defense.

Then again the committee said, actually it is on page 2 of the report, but it is the first full page of the text:

On November 29, 1988, the Committee held a formal meeting at which the Members considered and endorsed the standards and procedures for use in the review of nominations submitted by the incoming Administration. The meeting specifically focused attention on the role the Committee could play in encouraging the appointment of a defense management team of the highest quality, experience, and integrity by taking a rigorous but fair approach in the confirmation process.

Mr. President, in each of these comments, the comment by Senator EXON on television, the comment by Senator BREAUX on television, and the report from the Committee on Armed Services, a similar approach is taken; that is, that each Senator, the Armed Services Committee, and the Senate itself, should use a standard of perfection in passing on Presidential nominees.

I submit that that is contrary to the standard that has been used by the Senate throughout the history of this country.

We are about to have a vote sooner or later in which Republicans generally will be lined up on one side and Democrats on another side. I think really the question and the difference between the Republicans and the Democrats in this vote is the degree to which we defer to the President's choice of his team to serve in the Cabinet.

The issue is not, in my opinion and in the opinion of the Republicans who are going to be voting, and hopefully the opinion of the Democrats who will be voting, whether each one of us would have nominated John Tower for Secretary of Defense. I am sure that there are some Republicans who would not have nominated John Tower for Secretary of Defense. But in our view that is not the question.

The question is not whether we should substitute our judgment for the judgment of the President of the United States but whether we should give great deference to the President in selection of his own management team for his own administration.

In this connection history strongly supports deference to the President, and this is something that has been pointed out during this debate time and time again.

Last week we celebrated the 200th anniversary of the Congress of the United States. During that 200-year period of time I am told never has the United States failed to confirm the initial nominees of a President of the United States, never in 200 years, not once.

Some people have said in this debate, well, we have had 13 or 14 or 15, or whatever Presidential nominations that we have voted on in the Senate so far in the 101st Congress, and is it not wonderful that for 15 votes in the 101st Congress we have always voted to confirm the President's nominees, usually by unanimous vote? Is that not wonderful?

In the opinion of this Senator it is not particularly wonderful at all. It is simply the tradition.

What is remarkable is not that we voted for 15 times or so for Presidential nominees in the 101st Congress. What is remarkable is to turn the President down even once in the initial selection of his Cabinet. It is remarkable and it is unique. It has never been done before, and it establishes a precedent for a Senate which henceforth is willing to substitute its judgment for the judgment of the President in picking his own nomination.

In fact, only eight times in history has the Senate ever turned down a Presidential nominee at any point in the President's term.

I can imagine that when President Bush considered sending the name of John Tower to the Senate, one thought that might have been in his mind was what is the degree of deference normally accorded by the Senate to a nominee who has been a former U.S. Senator?

I have looked into this, and I am told that one time in the history of this country, one time in the history of the United States and only one time, has the Senate voted not to confirm a nominee who is a former Senator. That was the nomination of Thomas Ewing, a former Senator from Ohio, to be Secretary of War in 1868; 1868 was during the Presidency of Andrew Johnson, the low point in the relationship between the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States.

Surely, we have not reverted to the days of Andrew Johnson in the relationship between the President and the Senate.

The degree of deference accorded to the President determines how a Senator looks at the actual evidence, the information that is available to us in room S-407, the FBI report.

If a Senator is willing to accord deference to the President of the United States, then the Senator is likely to look at that evidence in the light most favorable to the nominee. On the other hand, if a Senator is not willing to accord deference to the choice of the President, then there is no particular presumption in favor of the nominee in looking at that evidence.

Here is what is interesting, Mr. President. What is interesting is if you go up to room S-407 and if you are interested in the alcohol issue, which is probably the most widely debated and widely discussed issue regarding the Tower nomination, if you are interested in the alcohol issue you are given a choice of three books, three ringed notebooks that you can read or you can read all three or two if you want on the question of alcohol. One of the notebooks is prepared by the majority staff of the Armed Services Committee. It relates the facts on the subject of alcohol in the light most favorable to a finding of alcohol abuse. That is one of the books you could pick.

Then there is a second book that was prepared by the minority staff and it relates the facts on alcohol in the light most favorable to the nominee. And then you can read a third book—and these are each about a half inch or three-quarters of an inch of Xeroxed material—you could read a third book which was jointly prepared by the majority and the minority staffs on the question of alcohol use. The point being simply this: That there are facts available in room S-407 which can be used by those who want to so use the facts to make a case against John Tower on the use of alcohol. Similarly, there are facts available in room S-407 which gives a Senator the ability to make a very strong case that John Tower does not abuse alcohol.

You can pick your book of facts. Or you can read the joint book of facts. There are facts that can be used to prove either side of the case.

So the issue before us, it seems to me, is what is the presumption that a Senator uses when he examines these facts? Do you look at them with a presumption that the nominee is wrong or the nominee is right; that is the nominee is dry or the nominee is wet? What is the presumption that is used by a Senator in examining the facts? And the presumption I believe has to do with the degree of deference, if any, that is given to a Presidential nominee.

I was surprised when I looked at that record to find out how ambiguous the record is. Yes, if I were trying to make a case against Senator Tower I could pick facts and quotes and words out of those volumes of reports and come to the floor of the Senate, if I were allowed to speak about it, and make that kind of argument.

However, I believe that it is accurate to say that every single statement, every single allegation that has been made against Senator Tower in those reports has been controverted by reverse allegations. So how do you judge a statement of fact that is made by one witness weighted against a statement made by another witness?

Even more difficult, let us suppose that there are more witnesses on one side than another side. How do we weigh that, Mr. President? Supposing that there is one person who alleges that he saw Senator X doing such and such and that there is another witness, one witness, who alleges the contrary. Who do we believe under those circumstances? That has to do with presumption.

Now suppose further that there is one witness who says that he saw Senator X do such and such and there are 10 or 12 or 13 witnesses who claim that they were there and they saw the opposite? How do we weigh the one witness against the 13?

I believe that the answer to that question has to do, again, with the degree of deference that we are willing to accord a President. If our rule is one of perfection, if our rule is whether we would have made the nomination, then we might say to ourselves a single statement is enough to poison the well; a single statement is enough to put a cloud over the nominee.

If, on the other hand, we say that we are willing to defer to the President's choice, then it seems to me that we would have to have the overwhelming weight of the evidence against the President's choice. In the opinion of this Senator—and I do not claim to be an expert; I have not spent months poring over that material, I have spent maybe a couple of hours poring over that material—but in the opinion of this Senator, Mr. President, trying to be objective, trying not to have any presumption for or against the nominee, if I were that objective, I would believe that the preponderance of the evidence in room S-407 is in favor of the nominee; that the weight of the evidence is in favor of the nominee. And I believe that it is accurate to say that, for a Senator who goes up there and simply totes up the number of statements made on one side or another, the overwhelming weight of the evidence is that John Tower does not have a problem in abusing alcohol. I believe that that is the case.

Then we have the question: Well, let us suppose that there is evidence on both sides. How do we judge one person's statement from another, one eyewitness account against another eyewitness account? And I would say that one way to judge is on the basis of what rings true to each of us on the basis of our own personal experience. What rings true? What statement of facts accords with our own personal experience, those of us who have worked with John Tower?

It is said that there are 70 Members of the U.S. Senate who served with John Tower. I am one of them. I served with him I think for 8 years. I went on a trip abroad with him. We went to NATO and Brussels and then we went to the Soviet Union on a trip that was led by Senator Baker. That trip lasted perhaps a week or 10 days, I could not remember which. It was in the late 1970's. I was with Senator Tower day and night during that time and never saw him under the influence of alcohol to my recollection.

And then for each one of us who served with him, think back when he was the chairman of the Armed Services Committee or the ranking member and when he stood here at the leader's desk for those complicated bills that were on the floor for weeks, 2 or 3 weeks each. And think back in your own experience and ask yourself: Was he impaired? What did you observe at that time?

I can remember at that time being in my hideaway, turning on the television and wondering at the ability of that man to deal with complicated subject matter for 10, 12, 15, whatever hours a day, day after day after day.

Mr. President, I believe that it is straining to find that John Tower runs the risk of impairment from alcohol. I think that it is contrary to the clear weight of the evidence that has been presented to us. And I think that it flies in the face of our own experience.

Furthermore, to find that alcohol abuse should be a disqualifying factor, we would have to give little or no weight to Senator Tower's pledge that should he be confirmed he is not going to drink anything. How can we come to a conclusion which pays no attention to that pledge, which is contradicted by our personal experience as colleagues in the Senate and which is contradicted by the weight of the evidence in that file unless we approach that evidence saying to ourselves that we have no presumption in favor of the President's nominee at all but that any cloud is sufficient to satisfy us that maybe there is somebody better out there whom the President can send to us?

That, I would suggest, is the wrong standard for us to use and that is the standard that is clearly contrary to 200 years of history, of the relationship between the President of the United States and the U.S. Senate.

Mr. EXON. May I ask a question of my colleague?

Mr. DANFORTH. Certainly.

Mr. EXON. I do not want this to interrupt. I would like to have my comments shown after the talk by the Senator from Missouri. He is entitled to be heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. EXON. I have a hearing I was supposed to chair 10 minutes ago. I would like a brief reply. I would be glad to wait for a few more minutes. If not, would the Senator let me talk now? I will be glad to wait. How long does the Senator intend to be?

Mr. DANFORTH. Say 15 minutes.

Mr. EXON. Would my colleague object to me taking 15 minutes now to make some reference to the comments he made about this Senator's appearance, so long as they come after the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. DANFORTH. No, Mr. President, I would just as soon have the comments come during my remarks as far as they appear in the RECORD.

I would be happy to yield the floor to the Senator from Nebraska if that is what he wishes, provided that after he finishes his comments I am then recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. EXON. I thank very much my friend and colleague.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. EXON. I have been listening very carefully. I have a lot of confidence in him, especially in his advice to the U.S. Senate and especially his knowledge of baseball and which baseball team to support. It becomes a sharp disagreement when it comes to college football, but that is the way the ball bounces.

I do not know that I want to disagree very much with much of what the Senator said, but I do take exception to the emphasis that he is making and, as a matter of fact, to matters that have been covered in his remarks.

First, just let me say with regard to the deferring to the President, I think this Senator has deferred to the President of the United States, and I have served under three here in the Senate. I believe this is the first Cabinet appointment that I will vote against. So I have deferred to the President, and generally agree with the comments made by the Senator from Missouri in that regard.

Could we have order in the Senate, please? Could we have order in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. EXON. But with regard to that, let me just say that I think, by my reputation and my voting record in the Senate, this Senator has been clearly and indelibly stamped as an independent. And that means that myself and others who have been leading the fight against this nomination are those that generally will be independent when we come to deciding matters like this, of significant importance.

So I defer to the President, except when I think he is critically wrong. The statement that the Senator from Missouri quoted, that I made on a television program yesterday, is entirely accurate. Just let me say that while I agree with the context, that we should generally support the President of the United States, I think the Constitution clearly gives us the opportunity, if not the duty, to oppose a nominee if we do disagree very strongly.
